THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES

(STEINWAY HALL, NEW YORK).

Attention is directed to the CHANGE in the LONDON ADDRESS of MESSRS. STEINWAY & SONS, their New and Enlarged Premises, like the recent addition of 400 Acres to their business territory in New York, having been rendered necessary by the pressure of the world-wide demand for their instruments.

STEINWAY HALL,

LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, PORTMAN SQUARE,

THE

(THE MOST PERFECT OF AMERICAN ORGANS).

The Name of "BURDETT" is a household word throughout the United States of America in connection with the higher types of the AMERICAN ORGAN, he having been the Inventor of almost all the special improvements which have raised the instrument above the level of the European Harmonium, and given to it its present artistic value. The same creative genius and practical skill still characterises all his productions, rendering the "Burdett" the most perfect representative of the American Organ in existence.

The Instruments can be seen and examined at the Central Depot for the United Kingdom, and Descriptive Illustrated Catalogues will be forwarded on application.

CHALLEN AND SON'S

20, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

ESTABLISHED 1804.

PRIZE MEDAL, LONDON, 1862. | GOLD MEDAL, SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.

The only Firm who obtained the International Exhibition Medal for the special distinction of "excellence of touch and tone."

WITH CHECK ACTION, IN ELEGANT WALNUT OR ROSEWOOD CASE.

FROM 29 GUINEAS.

"The Pianettes manufactured by CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments."—Anton Rubinstein.

"I can testify in the strongest manner to the qualities of the Pianette as manufactured by CHALLEN & SON. In every point, as to tone and touch, they are excellent; and I can also certify from experience as to their durability under hard wear."—William Henry Monk, Professor of Music in King's College, London.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL SEMI-COTTAGE,

WITH CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 32 GUINEAS.

"The Pianos I have selected from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate."—William H. Cummings.

"As a customer of some years' standing, I speak with confidence of the quality of the instruments supplied by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON. The two I have for my own use have had a great deal of wear, and in this respect have entirely satisfied me as to their durability; and the tone and touch of all those selected by me for myself or pupils have been much commended."—Alfred Gilbert, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL COTTAGE;

TRICHORD THROUGHOUT; BRASS BRIDGE; CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 60 GUINEAS.

"I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos. Their qualities of tone and touch can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability."—Lindsay Sloper.

"CHALLEN & SON is a name synonymous with wonderful durability, great beauty of tone, and moderation in price. We know of not one single maker whose Pianos excel theirs in the qualities most desirable in a good and lasting Piano."—Cape Argus, May 7.

EXCELLENCE IS GUARANTEED, AND EVERY INSTRUMENT WARRANTED TO BE OF THE HIGHEST CLASS WORKMANSHIP AND MATERIALS.

EBONISED AND GOLD PIANOS

Kept in Stock, of Superior Make and Elegant Designs.

MR. EDWARD P. HAYWARD (good experience), disengaged for Director of Choir, Organist, Conductor of Choral Societies, Glee or Drawing-room Classes, and Private Pupils, Vocal, Instrumental, or Theoretical. Beechcroft, Onslow Road, Richmond Hill.

WANTED, for an old-established MUSICAL SOCIETY, some BOYS to take part in the performances. The Society holds ten meetings, at intervals of a fortnight, during the winter months, commencing at half-past seven and ending at half-past nine p.m. It is requested that no boy will offer himself who cannot sing a treble part at sight without accompaniment. In addition to the payment of 2s. 6d. for each boy on each night, the President will, at the close of the season, give two prizes of £1 each to the two boys whom the Conductor shall report to have been generally most efficient during the season. Applications to be addressed by letter in the first instance to Mr. C. D. Budd, care of Messrs. C. and E. Layton, 150 Fleet Street, E.C. Each application must be accompanied by a certificate of good character.

GOOD TREBLES and ALTOS (Boys) WANTED; also VOLUNTEERS (ALL VOICES) for Trinity Church, Finchley Road, near Swiss Cottage. Apply to Choirmaster, Mr. Edward P. Hayward, on Sunday; or address Beechcroft, Richmond Hill.

BOYS WANTED at S. Peter's, Eaton Square. There are four vacancies. Good middle-class education and salary according to merit. Apply to the Organist, S. Peter's Vestry, Eaton Square, S.W.

ALTOS, TENORS, BASSES (Voluntary) WANTED at S. Peter's, Eaton Square. Cathedral services. Only fair readers need apply. Address to the Organist, S. Peter's Vestry, Eaton Square, S.W.

WANTED, TWO TENORS and TWO BASSES at St. Philip's, Kensington. Full choral service. Particulars to be obtained of Organist, 83, Lancaster Road, Kensington Park, W.

TENOR WANTED for Nonconformist Church Choir. Apply, stating terms, to Mr. Bartram, 34, Douglas Road, Canonbury, N.

GENTLEMEN,—The Harmonium gives the greatest satisfaction, and is really the best instrument I have fallen in with.—Yours truly,
W. P. M. SLATER.
39, Franklin Street, South Shields, May 6, 1876.

GENTLEMEN,—By a mistake in the address the Harmonium was left at a wayside station, so that I did not get it here till last night; however, it is uninjured and gives me every satisfaction. Its tone and workmanship are admirable, and in rapidity of touch it is quite equal to a large Alexandre Percussion instrument, on which I sometimes play. I shall always be glad to recommend your Harmoniums.—Believe me, faithfully yours,
W. F. ASHBRIDGE, M.A., Curate of Bessingby.
Bessingby Road, Bridlington, Dec. 15, 1876.

Mr. J. M. Boulard, Manager of the Alleghanians, Vocalists and Bell Players.
DEAR SIR,—The Harmonium you made for me in travelling case answers our purpose exceedingly well, and my company are all delighted with it.—Yours truly, J. M. BOULARD.
Sept. 16, 1876.

GENTLEMEN,—Kindly find cheque for the Harmonium to hand. I may add that our people are very much pleased with the instrument. It is a little gem.—Yours faithfully, J. W. H. WOOD.
Shirland and Higham School Board, Shirland, near Alfreton,
Feb. 2, 1877.

DEAR SIR,—The Harmonium arrived here yesterday. I am much pleased with it, and it is a very pretty, nice-looking instrument.—Yours truly, DAVID BRUCE.
Merrington Vicarage, Terry Hill, Dec. 10, 1875.

GENTLEMEN,—The Harmonium arrived here in capital condition last week. I am very pleased with it. The tone is exceedingly sweet and pleasing. All who have seen it here like it very much.—Yours faithfully, H. R. HOLME.
Montserrat, West Indies, Aug. 11, 1876.

WARD'S
ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,

FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

TESTIMONIAL.

"Barrow Street, Quorndon, near Loughborough,
"July 16, 1877.

"SIR,—It is now over two years since I purchased a set of your pedals and action for pianofortes. After having thoroughly tested them and used them regularly for so long a period I have no hesitation in saying that they are a most decided success, and at the same time advise every organ student who wishes to become proficient in the art of pedalling to procure a set of them at once.

"I remain, Sir, yours truly,
"To Mr. J. Hamilton." "J. J. CALLIS.

MANUFACTORY: LITTLE KING STREET NORTH, CAMDEN TOWN, LONDON, N.W.

Great Exhibition, 1851. Class 10. No. 528.

Chief characteristics of the "SNELL" HARMONIUM. Pure, musical, and euphonious quality of tone, possessing great sweetness and organlike character, combined with perfect articulation and equality of sound throughout the scale, the tenor notes not predominating over the treble. Light and elastic touch, rendering the instrument equally effective for Secular as for Sacred Music. Simplicity and novelty of action. Improved mechanism and superior finish throughout. Durability, general excellence, and extreme moderation of price. Full particulars, designs, and prices, with testimonials specially referring to the important improvements introduced into these much admired instruments, free of the makers, E. and W. SNELL, as above. Profession and trade supplied.

A DICTIONARY OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

(A.D. 1450—1874).

BY EMINENT WRITERS, ENGLISH & FOREIGN.

EDITED BY

GEORGE GROVE, D.C.L.

The want of English works on the history, theory, or practice of Music or the biographies of Musicians, accessible to the non-professional reader, has long been a subject of remark. This want the DICTIONARY OF MUSIC is designed to meet. It will contain articles on musical history and biography, on the science and practice of composition, and the nature, construction, and use of musical instruments, explanations of musical terms, and general information on modern music since the fifteenth century, the whole arranged alphabetically, and so given as to be intelligible to the amateur, as well as useful to the professional musician. Every effort will be made to compress the articles as much as possible, consistent with their being intelligible and readable. Illustrations in music type and occasional wood-cuts will be given.

Among the contributors to the Dictionary the following may be named: J. R. Sterndale Bennett, Esq.; W. Chappell, Esq., F.S.A.; M. Gustave Chouquet, Keeper of the Museum of the Conservatoire de Musique, Paris; Mrs. Carr; W. H. Cummings, Esq.; Herr Paul David; J. W. Davison, Esq.; E. Dannreuther, Esq.; E. H. Donkin, Esq.; H. S. Edwards, Esq.; Dr. Franz Gehring, Vienna; Rev. Thomas Helmore, Master of the Children of the Chapel Royal; Franz Hueffer, Esq.; Dr. Ferdinand Hiller; Rev. J. Percy Hudson; John Hullah, Esq.; Mr. W. H. Husk, Librarian to the Sacred Harmonic Society E. J. Hopkins, Esq., Organist to the Temple; A. J. Hipkins, Esq. Charles Mackeson, Esq.; Herr A. Maczewski, Kaiserslautern; Julian. Marshall, Esq.; Dr. E. G. Monk; Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, Bart., Professor of Music, Oxford; C. Hubert H. Parry, Esq.; Edward H. Pember, Esq., Q.C.; W. Pole, Esq., F.R.S., Mus. Doc.; E. MUSIC IN CONNECTION WITH DANCING.

By CHARLES K. SALAMAN.

THE intimate connection which has existed between music and dancing from the earliest times will be found to be a musical subject of considerable interest, whether regarded from an historical, a social, a classical, or an artistic point of view. It is associated with periods remote and near, with countries barbarous and civilised, with war, social customs, religion, the drama, national pastimes, and with education. Lucian regarded music and dancing as a "married pair." The history of the dance is comprised in the history of music, of which it is a department of wide range. The influence of the dance upon musical composition, both vocal and instrumental, sacred as well as secular, has been long acknowledged.

By the ancients music was deemed a comprehensive art. In its most enlarged acceptation it comprehended melody, dance, and song; in other words, sound, motion, and poetry. The three arts were inseparable; and there can be little doubt that the marvellous effects attributed to the music of the ancients are directly traceable to their intimate alliance. The earliest recorded instance of a purely instrumental performance relates to Agelaus of Tigea, who is said to have gained a crown of honour for playing on stringed instruments, unaccompanied by song, about 500 years before the Christian era.

In the first "Alcibiades" of Plato, Socrates is supposed to inquire of his noble pupil, "What art is that to which it belongs to sing, to play, and to dance? Can you not find a name for this comprehensive art?" "You seem to hint at music," replied Alcibiades. "You speak truly," rejoined the philosopher.

Plato despised instrumental music as an abuse of melody. In this he probably exhibited commendable wisdom! The Greek dramatist Antiphanes—being a writer of comedies, and perhaps looking at the subject from a comic point of view—is said to have found that "a concert of sweet sounds apart from words was agreeable, and not devoid of meaning."

Tryphon, a grammarian who flourished during the reign of Augustus, mentions the names of airs composed for the flute to accompany dancing. The classic pages of Greece and Rome are full of allusions to the intimate union of dancing with music. We find scattered through the poems of Homer, Horace, and other illustrious poets of antiquity many charming descriptions of music in alliance with dancing. Of the twelve compartments into which the critics have divided the wonderful shield of Achilles, four have been held to refer to music in connection with dancing. The following three quotations from the eighteenth book of the Iliad will illustrate this:—

αὐλοὶ φόρμιγγές τε βοὴν ἔχον.

The youthful dancers in a circle bound
To the soft flute and cittern's silver sound.—POPE.

Τοῖσιν δ' ἐν μέσσοισι πάϊς φόρμιγγι λιγείῃ ἱμερόεν κιθάριζε· λίνον δ' ὑπὸ καλὸν ἄειδεν λεπταλέῃ φωνῇ· τοὶ δὲ ῥήσσοντες ἀμαρτῇ, μολπῇ τ' ἰύγμῷ τε, ποσὶ σκαίροντες ἕποντο.

To these a youth awakes the warbling strings,
Whose tender lay the fate of Linus sings;
In measured dance behind him move the train,
Tune soft the voice, and answer to the strain.—POPE.

Ἐν δὲ χορὸν ποίκιλλε περικλυτὸς Ἀμφιγυήεις,
τῷ ἴκελον, οἷόν ποτ' ἐνὶ Κνωσῷ εὐρείῃ
Δαίδαλος ἤσκησεν καλλιπλοκάμῳ Ἀριάδνῃ.
Ἔνθα μὲν ἠίθεοι καὶ παρθένοι ἀλφεσίβοιαι ὠρχεῦντ', ἀλλήλων ἐπὶ καρπῷ χεῖρας ἔχοντες.

A figured dance succeeds; such once was seen
In lofty Gnossus for the Cretan queen,
Formed by Dædalean art; a comely band
Of youths and maidens, bounding hand in hand.—POPE.

It would appear that the dancers of ancient Greece displayed feats of agility which might have rivalled the flights of the most famous French ballet-dancers. In the Odyssey we read,— ἀμφὶ δὲ κοῦροι

προθεῖβαι ἵσταντο, δαήμονες ὀρχηθμοῖο· πέπληγμον δὲ χορὸν θεῖον ποσίν.

Skilled in the dance, tall youths, a blooming band,
Graceful before the heavenly minstrel stand;
Light-bounding from the earth, at once they rise,
Their feet half-viewless quiver in the skies.—POPE.

The lovers of the ever-welcome Horace will recall with pleasure the following lines extracted from his Odes:—

Nec dulces amores
Sperne, puer, neque tu choreas.—Car. i. 9.

Spurn not thou, who art young, dulcet loves,
Spurn not thou choral dances and song."

Illic bis pueri die
Numen cum teneris virginibus tuum
Laudantes, pede candido
In morem Salium ter quatient humum.—Car. iv. 1.

There, twice a day, shall youths
Choral with tender maidens chant thy name,
As thrice, in Salian dance,
Quakes the green sod to feet that twinkle white.
LORD LYTTON.

Jam Cytherea choros ducit Venus, imminente Luna,
Junctæque Nymphis Gratiæ decentes
Alterno terram quatiunt pede, dum graves Cyclopum
Vulcanus ardens urit officinas.—Car. i. 4.

Beneath the overhanging moon, now Venus leads her dances,
And comely Graces, linked with jocund Nymphs,
Shake with alternate foot the earth, while ardent Vulcan kindles
The awful forge in which the Cyclops toils."
LORD LYTTON.

The foregoing will suffice to demonstrate the favour in which the subject of music in connection with dancing was held by the great poets of antiquity.

In the enlarged and comprehensive sense in which music was understood by the ancients, the art was held in such high esteem, and affected so largely their minds and actions, that it entered into and formed an important feature in every public and private pursuit. Its influence was almost universally felt. Prophets, emperors, and kings, priests, statesmen, and warriors, philosophers, orators, and poets, led or joined the dance, accompanied by song and musical instruments, to add to the solemnity of public worship, to inspire courage and impart vigour and physical prowess in times of war, and to increase the excitement, animation, and joy at public and domestic festivities. Warriors went forth to battle with measured stately paces, accompanied by choral songs, and by the sound of flutes, cymbals, and drums. According to the ancient idea, they danced to battle, striking their swords upon their shields to mark the rhythm. Phrynicus of Athens was chosen general in consequence of the ability which he displayed in a war-dance.

Thus music in connection with dancing conduced to fill the minds of the Grecian youth with generous and noble thoughts, to excite their imagination to the performance of great deeds, to invigorate their bodies as well as their minds, and to impart to their outward bearing grace and comeliness combined with a manly and dignified demeanour.

Both music and dancing were cultivated by the ancient Egyptians more than 3,500 years ago, and even at that remote period they had already attained considerable excellence in those arts. The late Sir Gardiner Wilkinson has given much valuable information on this point. Harps more than three or four thousand years old were discovered in a tomb near the Pyramids of Geezah. The Egyptians were skilled in the manufacture of musical instruments before the lyre was known in Greece. They had many wind instruments, as well as instruments of the string and pulsatile class—affording unquestionable evidence of an acquaintance with musical effects almost incredible at the present time, and of which unfortunately we know absolutely nothing. Delineations of men and women in dancing attitudes, to the accompaniment of musical instruments and the clapping of hands, have been discovered in ancient Egyptian tombs, copies of which are to be found in Sir Gardiner Wilkinson's and other works on Egypt. The "pirouette" of the modern ballet appears to have been skilfully executed by the dancers of ancient Egypt. The dancing of that country, according to Wilkinson, "consisted mostly of a succession of figures in which the performer endeavoured to exhibit a great variety of gesture." "Men and women danced at the same time, or in separate parties; but the latter were generally preferred on account of their superior grace and elegance. Some danced to slow airs adapted to the style of their movements, others affected a lively step regulated by an appropriate time, and men sometimes danced with great spirit, bounding from the ground in the modern European style." The Egyptians danced in their sacred temples. They performed "certain gestures to the sound of suitable music, and danced as they approached the precincts of their holy courts."

The ancient Hebrews acquired their knowledge of music and dancing from the Egyptians. Moses was learned in all Egyptian accomplishments. After the great exodus "Moses sang a song unto the Lord, and Miriam, with a timbrel in her hand, was followed by all the women of Israel with timbrels and with dances." The inspired writers of the Bible exhort us to praise the Almighty God "with cymbals, with the psaltery and harp, with songs and with dances." Jephtha was welcomed by his daughter "with timbrels and with dances." David, after vanquishing the Philistines, was met by the women who "came out of all cities of Israel, singing and dancing, to meet King Saul, with tabrets, with joy, and with instruments of music." David led the religious dance to the accompaniment of harps and choristers on the re-entry of the ark of God into Jerusalem. The religious dance was a stately march of measured steps, with gesture of the body, accompanied by unisonic music of a grave character.

The divinely inspired prophets are supposed by the learned Dr. Brown to have performed some kind of movements suited to the state and circumstances of their holy mission. It was not the Egyptians, Hebrews, Greeks, and Romans only, but the ancient Persians, the Ethiopians, the Scythians, and the Indian Brahmins who introduced dancing and music into their religious services. No solemn rite or sacred festival was exempt from their accompaniment. The sole occasion on which the ancient Persian kings were permitted to dance was at the festival and sacrifice held annually in honour of their god Mithra. Praises were then chanted to their god, accompanied by musical instruments and dancing.

Dionysius Halicarnassus relates, in his first book, that Dardanus, upon consulting the oracle as to his settlement, received the following answer relative to the custody of the gods: "Remember to establish in the city, which you shall build, perpetual worship of the gods, and to honour them with safe-guards, sacrifices, and solemn dances and songs."

The Greeks were impressed with the belief that their most ancient gods had been originally not only their early legislators, but their instructors in the primitive arts of life, amongst which they classed dance and song. They imagined therefore that, in singing, dancing, and playing upon musical instruments during the sacrifices, they were making acceptable offerings to the gods. The titles "singer" and "dancer" were given by the poets of antiquity to some of the most ancient Grecian deities. Horace refers to Apollo as the "Singer;" he is named by Pindar the "Dancer:"—

> Prince of dancers, prince of grace,
> Hail, Phœbus of the silver quiver!

"And Homer too, or one of the Homeridæ," says Athanæus, in one of the Hymns to Apollo, sings:—

> How deftly Phœbus strikes the golden lyre,
> While strength and grace each moving limb inspire.

And Eumelus, or Arctinus, the Corinthian, introduces Jupiter himself as dancing, thus:—

> And gracefully amid the dancing throng
> The sire of gods and mortals moved along.

"Theophrastus," continues Athanæus, "says that Andron of Catana, the flute-player, was the first person who invented motions of the body keeping time to music, while he accompanied the dancers on the flute." The art of dancing was taught to her priests by Rhea, the mother of Jupiter, and by Castor and Pollux to the Lacedemonians. Why the ancient heathen gods and goddesses should have been represented as singers and dancers passes the comprehension of the most erudite.

The oracles of Apollo were delivered by the "Pythia," or priestess of the temple, with frantic gestures, or dances, melody, and rhythm. "Whilst the sacrifices were burning in the temples of Greece it was usual for the priests and the persons who offered the victims to play upon musical instruments, in order to charm the god into a good humour. It was also customary to dance round the altar whilst the sacred hymns were sung. Choirs of boys playing on lyres and flutes accompanied others who danced. Upon the authority of Heraclides, who cites as his authority the Public Register preserved at Sicyon, Plutarch claims for Philammon of Delphi the honour of having instituted the choral dances round the temple at Delphi. The song-dances were called ὑπορχημάτα (hyporchemata). A religious song-dance called ὑπόρχημα (hyporchema) was from the earliest times connected with the worship of Apollo. The chorus danced and sang whilst the priests were officiating at the sacrifice. In reference to these religious song-dances Plutarch, in his "Peri Mousekees" ("On Music"), writes the following: "The first establishment of music in Sparta took place under the direction of Terpander. The second seems with good reason to have been the joint work of Thaletes of Gortyna, Xenodamus of Citheræ, Xenocritus of Locri, Polymnestes of Colophon, and Sacadas of Argos; for we learn that the Gymnopædic dances at Lacedæmon, the Representative dances in Arcadia, and the Endymatic (or clothed) dances in Argos were successively instituted by these musicians. Thaletes, Xenodamus, and Xenocritus are mentioned as composers of Pæans, Polymnestes of Orthian songs, as they are called, and Sacadas of Elegies. Yet there are some who affirm, and Pratinas amongst them, that Xenodamus was not a composer of pæans, but only of Hyporchemas (or 'songs to be accompanied by dancing'), and a song of his is extant which is obviously a Hyporchema. Pindar himself wrote pieces of this kind; and his compositions enable us to discern the difference between the Pæan and the Hyporchema, as we find among them specimens of both." After attributing to Apollo the invention of the flute, Plutarch adds, "In proof of this I appeal to the custom of accompanying the choral dances and sacrifices in honour of the god by the sound of flutes, a custom recorded by many authors, and among them by Alcæus in one of his Hymns."

Among the many celebrated dances of antiquity was the Pyrrhic. It was a martial dance accompanied by flutes, and was performed by young men in full armour. They marked the time of their movements by striking their swords upon their shields. The Pyrrhic dance, according to Plato, represented a mock fight, the dancers imitating in their postures all the actions of combatants in vaulting and leaping, giving and receiving blows. Its time was rapid and light. Athanæus classes the Pyrrhic amongst the "lyric dances." He informs us that they required for it in his day "the most beautiful airs" and the most "stirring tunes." Xenophon, in the "Anabasis," describes some dances of a martial character which formed part of an entertainment given by the Greeks to the Paphlagonians. He says, "After libations were made, and the guests had sung a pæan, then rose up first the Thracians and danced in armour to the music of a flute, and jumped up very high, with light jumps, and used their swords. And at last one of them struck another, so that it seemed to every one that the man was wounded. And he fell down in a very clever manner, and all the bystanders raised an outcry. And he who struck him, having stripped him of his arms, went out singing. And others of the Thracians carried out his antagonist as if he were dead, but in reality he was not hurt. After this some Magnesians rose up, who danced the dance called Carpæa, they too being in armour. And the fashion of that dance was like this: one man having laid aside his arms, is sowing, and driving a yoke of oxen, constantly looking round as if he were afraid. Then there comes up a robber, but the sower, as soon as he sees him, snatches up his arms, and fights in defence of his team in regular time to the music of the flute. And at last the robber, having bound the man, carries off the team; but sometimes the sower conquers the robber, and then, binding him alongside his oxen, he ties his hands behind him and drives him forward. And one man danced the Persian dance, and, rattling one shield against another, fell down, and rose up again; and he did all this in time to the music of a flute. And the Arcadians rising up, all moved in time, being clothed in armour, the flute-players playing the tune suited to an armed march, and they sang the pæan and danced."

The modern Greeks have a military dance which they claim to be a relic of the martial dances of their ancient countrymen. It is danced by the Albanians in full armour. Lady Mary Wortley Montague, writing from Adrianople in 1717, says of the modern Grecians, "Their manner of dancing is certainly the same that Diana is said to have danced on the banks of Eurotas. The great lady still leads the dance, and is followed by a troop of young girls, who imitate her steps, and, if she sings, make up the chorus. The tunes are extremely gay and lively, yet with something in them wonderfully soft. The steps are varied according to the pleasure of her who leads the dance, but always in exact time, and infinitely more agreeable than any of our dances. I sometimes make one in the train, but am not skilful enough to lead. These are the Grecian dances; the Turkish are very different."

Many social dances of ancient Greece are mentioned by Athanæus, some deemed "respectable," others "indecorous." The Cordax is included among the latter, the Emmelea among the former. The best were those which were accompanied by voices. The following form of words was sung to the Anthemæ, which was danced with a kind of mimicking gesture:—

Where are my roses, and where are my violets?
Where is my beautiful parsley?
Are these then my roses, are these then my violets?
Is this my beautiful parsley?

"Among the Syracusans," says the same writer, "there was a kind of dance called the Chitoneas, sacred to Diana, and it is a peculiar kind of dance accompanied by the flute." He mentions also other dances of a ridiculous character—the Igdis, the Mactrismus, the Apocinus, the Sobas, the Owl, the Lion, the Pouring out of meal, the Abolition of debts, and the Elements. "And they also," adds our author, "danced, to the accompaniment of the flute, a dance which they called the Dance of the master of the ship, and the Platter dance." Other dances, too numerous to be here referred to, are likewise noticed. "Now," says the writer, "in dancing the motion of the feet was adopted long before the motion of the hands was considered requisite, for the ancients exercised their feet more than their hands in games and in hunting. . . . . There are three kinds of dance appropriate to dramatic poetry, viz. the tragic, the comic, and the satiric; in like manner there are three kinds of lyric dancing, viz. the Pyrrhic, the Gymnopædic, and the Hyporchematic. The Pyrrhic and the Satyric consisted of rapid movements. The former was danced by armed boys, and was clearly an exercise for war, as men in war have need of swiftness to pursue their enemies, and also when defeated. Gravity and solemnity were characteristics of the dances called Gymnopædica and Emmelea."

The Orchesis, the dance of Greece, and the Saltatio, the dance of Rome, in addition to measure, motion, and figure, aimed at the expression of human passion. Gestures, even when the body remained unmoved, were included in those terms. The dance of antiquity was, so to speak, a kind of "silent poetry." Lucian describes it as a species of "mute rhetoric." We have its full development in the grand modern ballets of Italy. The religious dances accompanied by vocal and instrumental music consisted of gentle movements of the body, with simple attitudes. The dance was taught and directed by the priests, who, it is said, found it to be their interest to uphold its grandeur and reputation, so long as it supported its sacred character, as an aid to religion. Socrates, who was deeply skilled in music, was very partial to dancing. He acquired the art at an advanced age from the beautiful Aspasia, the most accomplished and fascinating woman of her time. Xenophon relates that Socrates was often caught by his friends dancing for his own personal enjoyment. Sophocles was an accomplished musician and dancer. He learned those arts in his youth from Lamprus. After the naval victory of Salamis, he is reported to have danced, to the music of the lyre, round the trophy erected by the Athenians to commemorate that event. No less celebrated as a musician and dancer was the famous Theban general Epaminondas, who is represented by his biographers to have been a skilful performer both on the harp and flute, as well as an elegant dancer.

The lyric poem was sung with the accompaniment of dancing. The Odes of Pindar and Anacreon were therefore danced as well as sung. Anacreon is represented on a vase in the British Museum dancing, while accompanying his voice with a lyre.

LAW AND COPYRIGHT.

THE importance of anything that takes place in our law-courts just now with reference to questions of property in literary or artistic works is materially lessened by the fact that the Copyright Commission may be expected soon to issue a report, which Parliament, in its wisdom, will doubtless act upon. Let us hope that the labours of the commission will finally clear up a much bemuddled question, show a fair road to those who wish to act justly, and bar the way to all whom considerations of upright dealing never trouble. That the task is difficult we know; but no labour should be spared when the object is to safeguard the interests of a class of property-owners whose possessions offer special and peculiar inducements to plunder. Meanwhile the sort of conduct against which future legislation must be directed receives occasional illustration in our courts, and it is worth while, on this account alone, to notice here two suits which have lately engaged the attention of her Majesty's judges.

In one of these cases Messrs. Boosey and Co. sought an injunction to restrain Mr. Fairlie, late manager of the St. James's Theatre, from publicly performing Offenbach's Opera "Vert-Vert" without their consent, the right of such performance being vested in them according to the act. The question turned wholly upon sufficient or insufficient registry, and may be substantially set forth in few words. Messrs. Boosey having acquired the right of performing "Vert-Vert" in England, duly registered the work and its assignment to them at Stationers' Hall. No copy of the full score or parts was, however, deposited, for the sufficient reason that, at the time, the score remained in manuscript, and the separate parts had not been transcribed and printed. Instead of this, Messrs. Boosey made entry of and deposited a pianoforte score by Soumis. According to the Lords Justices, the entry of Soumis' arrangement was, as regards the validity of the registration of Offenbach's work, superfluous and its deposit unnecessary. It was this entry, however, which led to litigation. According to the decision in "Wood v. Boosey," the registration of an arrangement in the name of the composer of the music, and not of the maker of the arrangement, is invalid. When therefore Soumis' pianoforte score was found to be entered and deposited on the same day with the entry of the original work, and under the name of Offenbach, Mr. Fairlie, or his advisers, concluded that not only was the arrangement unprotected, but that the entire entry was worthless. At any rate, this was the defendant's main allegation; and, having the idea that Messrs. Boosey possessed no legal right in "Vert-Vert," portions of the music were adapted from Soumis' book, and performed at the St. James's Theatre in a pasticcio Opera of the same name. It must be said for Mr. Fairlie that Vice-Chancellor Bacon, before whom the matter came in the first instance, took his view of the case, and decided that the thing registered was not Offenbach's score but Soumis' book, wrongfully described as Offenbach's. The Lords Justices, on the other hand, decided in favour of Messrs. Boosey on every ground. They held that the invalid entry of Soumis' arrangement must not be considered as overriding "the entry relating to the Opera in the same column, which, as containing the earlier date, is primâ facie the more important one, and to convert the whole of the preceding entries, which per se are in their terms applicable to the Opera, into an attempted and, it is now admitted, invalid registration simply of the pianoforte arrangement." This is, beyond all question consistent with equity. On the very face of the matter it was clear that Messrs. Boosey intended to register Offenbach's Opera and not Soumis' score, the entry of which, though worthless in itself, owing to an improper description, could only by a gross injustice be held to invalidate the whole claim. The case is peculiar, and not likely to be repeated, but it serves to show against what sort of opponents the owners of literary and artistic property have to guard. Let ever so slight a flaw, real or imaginary, be detected in the title, and peaceful possession is certain to be at an end. It demonstrates, moreover, the need for legislation so clear and simple that mistakes, being impossible, can never arise to excite cupidity and unscrupulousness.

The second case is of a very different character, though it serves to point the same moral as the first. Messrs. Metzler, as everybody knows, are the publishers of a pianoforte instruction-book by M. Hémy, which has had a long run of public favour, and is no doubt a valuable property. In this value lies the active principle of the whole matter. Now let us see the principle at work. At Messrs. D'Almaine's sale, Mr. Bickerton, who trades under the style and title of Wood and Co., bought the plates of an old instruction-book by Jousse, and, after they had been in his possession some time—Messrs. Metzler's book all the while growing in favour—he engaged M. Hémy to prepare a new edition. So far all was fair and aboveboard. But Mr. Bickerton was not content to have M. Hémy's name on the title-page of his Jousse in the modest place belonging to a simple editor. He must, forsooth, put the editor above the author, and so contrive that a person taking up the book would have his eye caught by the name of the man whose original work, published by Messrs. Metzler and Co., is so esteemed. There were other points at issue, but Vice-Chancellor Malins had no difficulty in dealing with that of colourable imitation. It was, in his view, clearly the intention of Mr. Bickerton "to deceive in getting up this old forgotten work, which was said by competent musical witnesses to have now no intrinsic value." We can add nothing to the severity of this remark. But we may again point to the absolute need for such unmistakable measures of protection as shall make "sharp practice" unprofitable. It is clear that every weak point is known to the enemy, and it should be the business of the Copyright Commission to strengthen all with the utmost care.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. III.—MOZART (continued).

LAST month I dealt with the letters of Mozart from his arrival in Paris down to the time when he re-accepted service under the Prince-Archbishop and rejoined his father and sister at Salzburg. In the first week of November 1780 the composer started on leave for Munich to produce his Opera "Idomeneo," and at this point the instructive epistles of the son to the father are of course resumed. From one of them we learn how persistently, as well as deeply, Mozart could cherish an aversion. He never liked his prince nor his position, and time only made him more and more bitter against both. This was Leopold Mozart's great sorrow, and we can conceive the old man's dismay on hearing from his son to the following effect: "You know, dear father, that I only stay here [Salzburg] to oblige you, for, by heavens! if I followed my own inclinations, before coming here I would have torn up my last diploma; for I give you my honour that, not Salzburg itself, but the prince and his proud nobility, become every day more intolerable to me. I should rejoice were I to be told that my services were no longer required. . . . Come soon to see me at Munich, and to hear my Opera, and then tell me whether I have not a right to feel sad when I think of Salzburg." Leopold Mozart seems to have been both selfish and blind with regard to his son, whose remonstrances and complaints were wasted, nor did he cease to urge his narrow views upon the young genius. At Munich, however, Wolfgang was too busy to heed the parental admonitions, and, by help of his letters, we very clearly see him working with might and main at "Idomeneo." We get glimpses, besides, of his opinions on more than one matter. He frequently objects to the undue length of his librettist's verses; he will not have dramatic situations weakened by Airs or Duets which compel the actors not engaged in them to stand idle on the stage, and he is very particular about the euphony of the lines. To his artists the master was most amiable, doing all in his power for the humouring of their little whims. In one place he writes, "The Aria is now excellent, but there is still an alteration recommended by Raaff; he is, however, right, and even were he not some courtesy ought to be shown to his grey hairs." Again, "I also wrote about Panzacchi; we must do what we can to oblige the good old man. He wishes to have," &c. The kindly spirit thus shown appears throughout, though Mozart could be firm enough when the artists went beyond their tether and wished to have that done which the composer thought hurtful to his music; while in dealing with an incompetent tenor, Del Prato, he seems to have preserved his equanimity only at the cost of a struggle. That Mozart was a man of spirit we have already seen, and Del Prato must have had a wholesome respect for a fiery little master who could write as follows: "You probably know that the worthy musico-Marchese, the Marquessius di Milano, has been poisoned at Naples, but how? He was enamoured of a duchess, whose rightful lover became jealous, and sent three or four fellows to give him his choice between drinking poison out of a cup and being assassinated. He chose the former, but, being an Italian poltroon, he died alone, and allowed his murderers to live on in peace and quiet. I would at least have taken a couple with me into the next world, if absolutely obliged to die myself." Imagine our dapper little Mozart drawing on the bravos and emulating Richard II.!

In due course (January 1781) "Idomeneo" was brought out with great success, and in March the composer was summoned to Vienna by his prince. At this point we enter upon the most momentous stage of Mozart's career, and the most interesting section of his letters, for we have now to see him, in the light of his own words, enduring up to the last degree of personal shame and humiliation out of regard for his father, and then bursting the Salzburg leading-strings to assert his privileges as a man.

Being a successor of the apostles, the Archbishop of Salzburg was no doubt perfectly content to travel like the "seventy" and live upon alms. But as a Prince of the Empire he had a dignity to sustain which made necessary the encumbrance of much unapostolic magnificence. Thus he took with him to Vienna his Master of the Household, Count Arco—of whom more anon—his keeper of archives, secretary, valets, comptroller, court-messenger, kapellmeister (Mozart), singer (Cecarelli), and violinist (Brunetti), as well as a host of less exalted servants. Mozart was overjoyed to have a chance of visiting the Austrian capital, but his first letter home shows a good deal of bitter mixed with the sweet. Take this extract, for example: "We dine at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, unluckily rather too early an hour for me. Our party consists of the two valets, the comptroller, Herr Zetti, the confectioner, the two cooks, Cecarelli, Brunetti, and my insignificant self. N.B.—The two valets sit at the head of the table. I have, at all events, the honour to be placed above the cooks; I almost believe I am back in Salzburg! At table all kinds of coarse silly joking go on, but no one jokes with me, for I never say a word, or, if I am obliged to speak, I do so with the utmost gravity, and when I have dined I go away." Not a word need be added to this picture, but note the dignified reserve of the young man "above the cooks." It is the beginning of the end. In the same letter Mozart complains that the archbishop took him about to "musicise" at the entertainments of the nobility, but was in no hurry to pay for such extra labour. After his manner Leopold Mozart sends back some mean-spirited observations, to which his son gives a characteristic reply: "What you write as to my presence contributing to the vanity of the archbishop is in so far just, but of what use is that to me? I cannot subsist on it. Believe me, I am right in saying that here he serves only as a screen to me. What distinction, pray, does he confer on me. Herr von Klemmayen and Bönike have a table apart with the illustrious Count Arco. It would be a distinction were I at this table, but not where I am now, with the valets, who, when not occupying the first seats at table, light the lustres, open the doors, and wait in the anteroom (when I am within), and with cooks too." Mozart then goes on to tell how it was the custom, when the Salzburg musicians attended at a nobleman's entertainment, for the archbishop's valet to wait outside for their arrival, and then to direct a footman to show them in. Against this the composer appeared in open revolt. Taking care to present himself at Prince Gallitzen's alone, he marched direct to the princess and paid his respects like any other gentleman, while Brunetti and Cecarelli were waiting in the distance for orders, without daring to advance. In April the archbishop, who had made a sufficient display of his musical entourage, wished to send Mozart and the two Italians home "by diligence," with the alternative of remaining in Vienna at their own expense. The composer would willingly have stayed, but his father would not hear of it. "When I think that I must leave Vienna," exclaims Mozart, "without bringing home at least 1,000 florins, I own it does go to my heart! So, for the sake of a malevolent prince, who daily maltreats me for a pitiful salary of 400 gulden, I must actually throw away 1,000! I should make that sum if I were to give a concert." The composer's disappointment was bitter, for life in Vienna seemed to him at the moment to be not only beautiful but full of promise. Nevertheless he prepared to set out on the day named by the archbishop, but, failing to receive some money due to him, postponed his departure. That step decided his fate, and was the cause of his being able to write, "I have no longer the misfortune to be in the Salzburg service, and to-day is a happy day for me." How it came about was in this fashion: Mozart, having gone to the archbishop's on the Wednesday named for his departure, was told by the valet that his master wished him to be the bearer of a packet. On learning that the matter was pressing, the composer said, "Then I regret I cannot have the honour of being of use to his Highness on this occasion, for, owing to particular reasons, I am not to leave this till Saturday." The valet was good enough to hold Mozart in the right, but not so the Prince-Archbishop, in whose apartment the following scene took place immediately afterwards. I must premise that the story about the post-chaise being full was a fib suggested by the sympathetic valet, and unworthily adopted by our hero:—

A. (to Mozart, as he enters). Well, when are you going, young fellow?
M. Highness, I intended to have gone to-night, but every place in the post-carriage is already engaged.
A. (furiously). You are the most dissipated fellow I know. No man serves me so badly as you, and if you don't start to-day I shall write home and stop your salary of 500 florins, you ragamuffin, you scamp, you rogue!
M. (with spirit). Your Grace does not appear to be satisfied with me.
A. (more furiously). What! do you dare to threaten me, you rascal? There is the door. I will have nothing more to do with such a low fellow.
M. Nor I with you.
A. (choking with rage). Begone!
M. (as he leaves the room). The thing is settled, and you shall have it to-morrow in writing.

After describing this edifying conversation to his father, Mozart actually thinks it necessary to justify himself: "My honour is more precious to me than all else, and I know it is the same to you. Be under no anxiety on my account; I am so sure of success here that for a much less cause I would have given up my situation. I have at three different times had good reason to do so, till such treatment seemed to become quite a matter of course. I was twice called a cowardly fellow, so I was resolved not to deserve the name a third time." The composer knew very well how the news would be received by his timid and selfish parent, and he even stooped to suggest duplicity as a means of evading apprehended trouble. In one letter he says, "Write to me by some private hand that you are satisfied—and in truth you may well be so—but publicly abuse me as much as you like, that none of the blame may fall on you." In another we read, "In the meantime, if you are afraid, pretend to be displeased with me, scold me well in your letters, and we two alone will know how the matter really stands." But neither abuse of the archbishop, of whom Wolfgang avowed a mad hatred, nor protestations of well-doing at Vienna, nor suggestions to say one thing and mean another, had any effect on the old man. Leopold strongly urged his son to make it up with the archbishop, who had repented of his violence and was not unwilling. Urging, however, proved to be of no avail. "Let us have done with it," wrote Wolfgang. Meanwhile he endeavoured to obtain a formal dismissal from his master, but Count Arco refused to present a memorial to the archbishop, and warned Mozart, "You have not the power to throw up the situation without your father's consent;" whereupon the musician, still smarting all over at the indignity he had suffered, replied, "I know my duty towards my father as well, and perhaps better, than you do; at all events I should be sorry to learn it from you." "Very well," answered the count, "if your father is satisfied he can request your discharge; and if not, why you can ask for it all the same." To account for the asperity of his language Mozart follows this up with a pitiful story of bodily and mental irritation: "All the edifying things that the archbishop had said to me in the last three audiences, especially in the last, and the pious epithets this admirable man of God applied to me afresh, had such an effect that the same evening at the Opera I was obliged to go home in the middle of the first act in order to lie down, for I was very feverish, trembled in every limb, and staggered in the street like a drunken man." Further on he says, "I did not know I was a valet," but, having found out his position, he had also come to a resolve: "If the Archbishop of Salzburg were to offer me a salary of 2,000 florins, and any other person 1,000, I would accept the latter, because with the 1,000 I should enjoy health and peace of mind. By all the fatherly love you have invariably shown me since my childhood . . . I adjure you, as you wish to see your son enjoy health and happiness, not to write to me any more upon the subject, but to bury it in the most profound oblivion, for one word more would suffice to rouse both my spleen and yours." Leopold Mozart, however, returned to the charge again and again, so fearful was he of some damage to himself from the offended prince; while Count Arco exerted all his powers to soothe Wolfgang's feelings and reconcile him to his old position. One of the conversations between the Master of the Household and the musician can be made out from the letters, and runs thus:—

COUNT. Mozart, your father has written to me complaining of your conduct.
MOZART. And have I not heard from him also? He has written to me in such a manner that I thought it would drive me crazy; but, reflect as I will, I find it impossible to draw back from my present position.
C. Believe me, you allow yourself to be too easily dazzled; a man's fame here is of very short duration. At first you will have praise enough, and make a great deal, too, no doubt; but how long will this last? After a few months the Viennese will want something new.
M. You are right, count, but you don't suppose that I mean to settle in Vienna? Quite the reverse. I know where to go.

I am afraid that this answer contains one of Mozart's fibs.

C. Well, I am very sorry.
M. The occurrence having taken place in Vienna is the fault of the archbishop and not mine. If he had known how to conduct himself towards men of talent it never would have happened at all. I am the best-tempered fellow in the world, Count Arco, when people are so with me.
C. Yet the archbishop considers you to be a most self-sufficient young man.
M. I daresay he does, for I am so towards him; just as people behave to me, so do I behave to them. When I see that a person despises me and treats me with contempt I can be as proud as any peacock.
C. But don't you know that I myself am often obliged to swallow very disagreeable words?
M. You have no doubt your own reasons for submitting to such a thing, but I have also mine for refusing to do so.

Evidently there was nothing to be done with this "most self-sufficient young man," yet Count Arco would not present the memorial for a formal discharge. At length, in the early part of June, the affair having lasted over a month, Mozart determined to Beard the lion in his den,

The Douglas in his hall, and present the request himself. So, with the document in his pocket, he one day entered the archbishop's house, and—was kicked out. Let there be no mistake about this, the words must be taken literally. The actual composer of "Idomeneo," the future author of "Don Giovanni" and the "Jupiter Symphony," was kicked out. The thing seems incredible, but we have Mozart's own word for it. He begins an indignant letter to his father in these terms: "A pretty business Count Arco has now made of it! So this is the way to persuade me to follow his advice, to refuse to present a memorial through inborn stupidity, not to venture to say one word to his master from want of spirit and love of toadyism, to keep me in suspense four weeks and at last compel me to present the memorial myself, and instead of at least giving me free access to the prince, to turn me out of doors with a kick. Such then is Count Arco, who (according to your last letter) has my interest so much at heart—such is the court I serve! When I arrive with a written document to present, I am maltreated! The scene took place in the anteroom. Of course there was nothing to be done but to go with all speed, not wishing to show disrespect for the prince's apartments, though Arco had not scrupled to do so." The iron entered into Mozart's soul with that desperate affront to his person. Again and again, in the letter just quoted, he returns to the "kick" with a bitterness of spirit much more intelligible than the feeling of respect for the prince's apartments which hindered him from paying Arco back in his own coin, little though he was. "If he had really been disposed to do me a good turn, he ought to have reasoned quietly with me, and allowed the affair to take its course, but not to bandy such words with me as 'clown' and 'saucy fellow,' and turn me out of the room with a kick." Subsequently he writes, "Instead of Count Arco taking my memorial, or procuring me an audience, or advising me to forward the document afterwards, or persuading me to leave the matter as it was—enfin, whatever he chose—he sends me off with a kick. I think this was a pretty broad hint that Salzburg was no longer a place for me, except to give me some favourable opportunity to return Count Arco's kick with interest, even should I meet him in the public street. I do not demand any satisfaction for such an insult from the archbishop; he cannot procure it for me as well as I can for myself; but I intend to write to the count to tell him what he may confidently expect as soon as fortune favours me by allowing me to meet him, wherever it may be — if not in a place that I am bound to respect." Mozart, no doubt, found consolation in such threats of vengeance, and several times indulged in them when writing home. On one occasion he sent his father a cane, remarking, "Who knows whether it may not, by your hand, avenge its former master on Arco? Of course I mean accidentally, by mere chance. My very practical reply shall not fail that arrogant jackass, were it twenty years hence; for to see him and return his kick without an instant's delay will be one and the same thing, unless I am so unlucky as to see him first in some sacred place." Again he writes, "It is the heart that ennobles a man, and though I am no count, I have perhaps more honourable feeling than many a count. But whether a man be a count or a house-porter, from the moment he insults me he is a scoundrel. Though I intend at first to represent to him quite coolly how badly and basely he managed the affair, yet I shall feel bound to add both a kick and a couple of boxes on the ear; for if any one offends me I must have my revenge, and if I did no more to him than he has done to me it would only be retaliation, and not punishment, and I should, moreover, thus place myself on a level with him; but I really am too proud to measure myself with such a stupid oaf." Mozart, as was natural, meant all this at the moment, but it may be more than suspected whether, under the most favourable circumstances, he would have carried out his threat. He was a man of spirit, but not a fool; and for a plebeian to assault a nobleman at that time and place amounted to what Dogberry would call "flat perjury as ever was committed." Mozart himself relates what was done to an acquaintance of his named Von Wiedmer, who, although of noble family, followed the business of a theatrical entrepreneur. On receiving an insult from a certain Baron Buffa, Von Wiedmer retaliated with a box on the ear. Immediately afterwards he was arrested, and, though asserting his nobility, taken to the guardhouse, tied up, and so soundly flogged that he kept his bed for three weeks afterwards. This incident, we may be sure, did not encourage the poor plebeian composer to try his hand on Count Arco, who, though he richly deserved a kick "with interest," never had it administered.

Reviewing the circumstances under which Mozart severed his connection with the archbishop, the most striking illustration of character is found, not in his spirit, which any man with better than the soul of a slave in him must have shown, but in the wonderful patience with which he endured the reproaches and argued against the advice of his father. The old man was most trying throughout—trying in the servility of his nature, in the selfishness which lay at the root of all, and in the unjust charges he brought against his son. But Wolfgang, though firm, never forgot the respect due even to an erring parent, and often he made replies which were really beautiful and touching. Once Leopold Mozart went so far as to say, "You have never shown any love for me, nor sacrificed your pleasures for mine." Wolfgang replied, "Can you really say this? What pleasures have I here? To be in trouble and anxiety to fill my purse. It seems to me that you really think I am revelling in pleasures and amusements. Oh, how completely are you mistaken!" Again, when the old man had scandalously compared him to Aloysia Weber, who had married an actor and neglected her widowed mother, Mozart wrote, "Your comparing me to Madame Lange made me feel sad all day. . . . God knows my only aim is to assist you and us all. Must I repeat it a hundred times that I can be of more use to you here than at Salzburg? I do beg, my dear good father, that you will spare me such letters in future. I conjure you to do so, for they only serve to irritate my mind, and to disturb my heart and spirit, and as I am now constantly occupied in composing, I require both a cheerful mind and a heart at rest." What could be more patient and forbearing than the spirit here shown? But Leopold Mozart did not confine his querulous complainings to the matter of Wolfgang's dispute with the archbishop. Discovering that his son was lodging with Madame Weber and her family, at that time settled in Vienna, the old man suspected danger through contact with Aloysia, who was also, with her husband, in the imperial city. To this Mozart replies, "What you write of the Webers I do assure you is not the fact. I was a fool about Madame Lange I own, but what is a man not when he is in love? But I did love her truly, and even now I feel that she is not indifferent to me; it is perhaps fortunate, therefore, that her husband is a jealous booby, and never leaves her, so that I seldom have an opportunity of seeing her." At another time he urges, in reply to one of the paternal lectures, "You may safely trust me. I am no longer a fool, and still less can you believe that I am a godless or an ungrateful son. You must now entirely rely on my head and on my good heart, and you shall never repent it." Again, when lectured about moral and religious conduct, he answers, "I am a fallible young man like others, but I can safely say that I wish all were as little so as myself. You perhaps believe things of me of which I am not guilty. It is not true that I boasted of eating meat on fast-days; but I did say that I cared little about it, and considered it no sin, for by fasting I understand short allowance, and eating less than usual. I attend mass every Sunday and every festival, and on weekdays also when I can; and you know, dear father, that such is the case." Having explained that his acquaintance with a certain lady began in ignorance of her character and ended with its discovery, Mozart concludes in these words: "Moreover, rest assured that I have a real sense of religion; and if ever I have the misfortune (which

By Henry C. Lunn.

It seems strange to be compelled to admit that for one person who lives his own natural and peaceful life, there are fifty who spend their days in restlessly imitating the lives of others. To appear affluent, rather than to be happy, would scarcely perhaps be the earnest desire of any sane man, were he not socially yoked with his fellow-men and driven by custom towards a spot which seems to be ever receding from his view. Imitation may certainly be the sincerest flattery; but when it is seen that the flattered have only graciously to accept the homage, whilst the flatterer exhausts his best energies in offering it, we cannot but wonder that the worker does not awaken to a consciousness of the absurdity of his self-imposed task. Abstractedly, there can be no question that were a person, with an income sufficient to ensure him from any worldly privations, to live according to his means, although he might not attract observation by any show of wealth, he would hold a fair name amongst those whose good opinion is worth securing; but when he attempts to imitate others above him, he merely renders his legitimate position insecure, whilst he utterly fails to reach that at which he aims. As in our social, so is it with our mental struggles for place and power. It often happens, for example, that an author, instead of developing any talent he may be possessed of, commences by imitating one who has already gained a fame, and, after a few years of struggle in that direction, generally ends by becoming a literary drudge. An actor, too, takes a living model for his guide, and presents us with so correct a copy that we can only know him from the original by the absence of any innate dramatic faculty. How many shadowy Byrons, Scotts, Keans, and Macreadys have thus gradually passed from our gaze—"inglorious," perhaps, but, alas, not "mute"!

In no one art, however, have we such direct imitation as in that of music; and as it unfortunately happens that the mannerisms of great artists, and not their talent, can alone be successfully copied, it is scarcely a matter of wonder that, as a rule, we reflect rather their defects than their merits. To take instances within our own knowledge, we recollect a lady who, whilst training as a vocalist, attended night after night at the Opera to listen to a celebrated prima donna who exhibited a very obvious peculiarity of the throat during the execution of certain passages. After careful study of some months, this peculiarity was faithfully reproduced by the student; but we do not remember that, either in the quality of her voice, or in the power of dramatically rendering her music, she made the slightest perceptible progress. Let us also cite the case of a Conductor in the country, who held a tolerable position amongst the Choral Societies in his immediate neighbourhood. He had of course, as all men should have, a desire to render himself still more competent for his post, and having heard that M. Jullien was one of the most popular Conductors in the metropolis, he journeyed to London and regularly went to the "Promenade Concerts" to improve himself. In a fortnight he reappeared in his native town, and on the same evening presented himself at the Conductor's desk in a huge white waistcoat, directed his orchestra with the most violent gestures, and at the conclusion of the first piece fell suddenly into an armchair, which had been carefully placed to receive him, in a state of perfect exhaustion. At first this little bit of pantomime was rather effective with the audience; but the applause gradually subsided as it was discovered that he really did not conduct the band one bit better than he did before his London visit, and it at length occurred to him that if he had bestowed as much trouble and expense in poring over the best scores that he had in procuring snow-white waistcoats, and purchasing an armchair to sink into, he would have earned a higher and more durable place both with his fellow-artists and his patrons. When Mendelssohn first played before an English audience it was remarked that he swayed slightly to and fro at the pianoforte, and the number of young performers who immediately moved about uneasily upon their music-stools, in imitation of this habit, was marvellous. Shaking their long hair from their eyes, after the manner of other distinguished foreigners, too, became a custom with many English artists at one time, the latest peculiarity—which we have adopted from our German visitors—being that of "playing from memory," a habit which has been proved to be dangerous even in an experienced artist, and certainly one to be carefully avoided by a student.

The method of endeavouring to form pupils by leading them to imitate the master is so often accepted in lieu of teaching that we can hardly wonder at its very general adoption, especially by those who have not studied how to impart a sound knowledge of the principles of the art they profess. We have vividly within our memory the precepts of one of our greatest English professors, who was so opposed to what he termed "parrot-teaching" that he rarely played during his lessons for fear his pupils should imitate him, and could cite innumerable instances of the skilful manner in which he gradually built up the musical mind, at the same time carefully forming every shade of touch, so that the varied tints required for the due realisation of a musical picture should be always at command. It was his theory that the playing represented the stage of the pupils' musical development, and that to urge them forward by performing something for them to copy was to crush their natural powers, and to raise up a race of imitators of a single artist. That the truth of these principles may be denied by many, we do not doubt; but let it be remembered that he who held these views laid the foundation of a school of pianoforte-playing in this country which his numerous pupils have succeeded in perpetuating, and which it will require an equally sound disciple of the "higher development" theory to supplant.

In composition we have seen, and still see, the same method of imitation pursued by many young students who might have made a name (although perhaps not a very high one) had they merely educated their own natural endowments. At one time Spohr held the sway, and then chromatic harmonies became the rage, and juvenile composers felt proud at being told that they were "English Spohrs." A Thalberg fever, too, set in with writers for the pianoforte, and themes given forth in the centre of the instrument, with arpeggios running rapidly above and below it, inundated the market until the model (ingenious and clever as were the specimens produced by its originator) grew positively obnoxious to all who were becoming acquainted with the highest works of the art. Then we need scarcely call attention to the imitators of Mendelssohn, for both in sacred and secular music we are even now surrounded by them. True it is that his works were so fascinating that, almost unconsciously, a composer in search of a style might reproduce the Mendelssohnian feeling, if not the actual passages; but as in literature it is an axiom that those who have not strength to rely upon themselves can never obtain more than a passing notoriety, so is it in music an admitted truth that those who have nothing of importance to say can never make their maunderings more successful by borrowing the method of those whose genius alone has created it.

Imitation, as we have already said, is the bane of society, and in artistic training is not only detrimental to progress, but positively destructive to the healthy growth of intellectual power. Study is necessary to develop even the highest genius; but if we desire to be real artists we must eventually give forth from within, rather than take in from without. The teacher who cultivates the faculty of imitation in his lessons, and the student who adopts it, are equally in the wrong; but it must be remembered that only one is culpable, for the latter is passive, whilst the former is active.

THE recent sale by the French Government of M. Courbet's pictures has drawn renewed attention to the unlucky Minister of Fine Arts under the Commune, who will be remembered, if not for his skill as a painter, for the dexterous way in which, under his direction, the Vendôme column was thrown down. M. Courbet has suffered much for his participation in the events of 1871, but came out of them more easily than M. Salvador Daniel, whom the "gentlemen of the pavement" made Director of the Conservatoire. M. Daniel, we are told by M. Weckerlin in his "Musiciana," was the son of a Spaniard who had migrated to Paris. In course of time he entered the orchestra of the Théâtre-Lyrique, and on the failure of that establishment went to Algiers, where he became professor of music at the Arab school, and Director of the Orphéon. On the death of a young lady to whom he was betrothed, M. Daniel returned to Paris, and the next we hear of him is that he took part in the attack on the Hôtel de Ville in October 1870, receiving a wound in the arm. The musical Communist was soon afterwards attached to the direction of the Fine Arts, and in May 1871, when the Versailles troops were nearly within the barriers, he invited the professors of the Conservatoire to meet him in consultation about the welfare of that establishment. Only four persons, two of them ladies, answered the call, and the meeting was postponed for a week. On the 20th of May, Daniel, with two other delegates, arrived at the Conservatoire, summoned M. Weckerlin from his post at the library, and, being joined by a couple of professors, proceeded to deliberate. The Communist's notions were certainly remarkable, for he began by contending that each class should have not one but ten or twenty professors, who should enlighten the pupils turn and turn about. Of course the professors present combated the idea, and the meeting broke up without result. As they separated, M. Weckerlin, who had known Daniel in former days, gave him a word of caution. The answer was, "I know I risk my life, but I must act according to my convictions." Three days afterwards the troops of M. Thiers were in the city, and a lieutenant, with ten men, paid a visit to the house of M. Daniel, 13, Rue Jacob. The Communist, who never thought of running away, was found in the act of dressing, and promptly admitted his identity. That was enough. Led down into the street, Daniel was placed against a wall and shot at once, his body lying where it fell for hours—so vouches an acquaintance of M. Weckerlin, who witnessed the execution (or murder, was it?) from a neighbouring window. It may be added that the unfortunate man published, in 1863, a book entitled "La Musique Arabe," which is now rare.

IN the paper on Beethoven by Mr. Thayer, to which we made reference last month, the industrious and accurate writer deals, inter alia, with the relations between the composer and his brother Johann. Many things have been said and accepted about Johann not at all to his advantage, and some of these are now shown to be utterly false. It is not true, for instance, that Ludwig started Johann in business at Linz, and thus enabled him to earn money which in after years he refused to lend his brother, or which, having lent, he roughly redemanded. The facts are that Johann bought his chemist's shop with funds he had laboriously amassed and deposited with Ludwig for safety. Ludwig, on his part, did not approve the enterprise, and gave up the cash with reluctance and anger. Neither is it true that Johann was always interfering in his brother's concerns, since, Mr. Thayer assures us, the name of the "landowner" does not occur in any "document, letter, or conversation" connected with the "brain-owner" from 1808 to 1822. It was Ludwig, rather, who interfered with Johann; who travelled to Linz on hearing that his brother intended to marry a girl then living with him as his mistress, and who went so far as to obtain an order from the police that if the young woman remained in Linz after a certain date she should be arrested and sent to Vienna as a vagabond. The result, as might have been expected, was that the infuriated Johann promptly married her, and snapped his fingers at both composer and police. Finally, it is not true that Johann did all he could to induce his brother to live with him, for the purpose of having control over his concerns. It was Ludwig, as Mr. Thayer conclusively shows, who wished to be near Johann when the ex-chemist retired from Linz to Vienna with a fortune, and who wrote urgently to that effect, putting the case thus: "As a matter of economy, what a saving for both parties, not to speak of the enjoyment!" Mr. Thayer, we again say, is doing excellent service by thus showing up the errors of Schindler, to whom, as the friend and companion of the master, most biographers have gone for information without troubling to make investigations on their own account.

Now that Italy has freed herself from the dominion of priest and Austrian, it is interesting to trace in books of a former period the working of the ecclesiastical and secular censorship. In many a dramatic poem, for example, the author shows himself careful to conciliate the agents of the Holy Office by protesting disbelief in, and detestation of the words and sentiments put into the mouths of the characters. Thus, one says: "The words fate, heaven, destiny, stars, divinities, and suchlike are poetic expressions, strange to the sentiments of the author, who considers himself a good Catholic. Written according to usage, they are believed according to duty." Another is more terse and emphatic: "The words fate, adore, and suchlike are expressions of the pen, not of the feelings of the author, who glories in being a true Catholic." A third spares no pains to set himself right: "You will find in this drama such words as idol, divinity, fate, adore, &c., used by our theatres to bring the pagans more and more into contempt, also maxims contrary to natural as well as to divine law, but proper to persons plunged in the errors of a blind idolatry. Condemn the said words and the thoughts which they express as hateful, and detest the said maxims as the deceptions of those who are not enlightened by the true and holy Catholic Faith." That the secular censorship looked keenly after the political virtue of Opera is well known. At Milan "Guillaume Tell" was played under the name of "Wallace," "Lucrezia Borgia" was known at Rome as "La Rinnegata," "Norma" (the word being objected to on account of its use in books of devotion in the sense of "guide" or "rule") as "La Foresta d' Irminsul," while it was more than the performers' liberty was worth to sing "Gridando libertà" in "Suoni la tromba," the censor having substituted "lealtà" for the hated word. Looking back upon all this, how we are reminded of Mrs. Partington and the Atlantic. The mops and brooms of the Holy Office, backed by countless bayonets, could not prevent the march of "la Libertà." It came on like the tide, and the censor, ecclesiastical and secular, had to seek other employment. But he left "footprints on the sands of time."

We cannot be certain that Mr. Isaac Binns fairly represents the state of musical culture in Batley, but he has recently given a lecture before the "Batley Field Naturalists' Society," from a notice of which we make the following extract: "A paper was read by Mr. Isaac Binns on the 'Attractions of Natural History,' in the course of which he adverted to two classes of so-called 'hobbies,' the first being music, athletics, cricketing, &c.; the second, drinking, dog-fighting, gambling, &c. The latter could not be too strongly condemned; and though the former were beneficial in their effects on the system, the study of natural history was more so, as it enriched both the body and the mind." It is gratifying to find that Mr. Binns places music on a level with "athletics, cricketing, &c.," although we should be extremely glad to know what "hobbies" he includes in the vague "&c." As "drinking, dog-fighting, and gambling" are indignantly excluded, perhaps shooting, football, and lawn-tennis may be admitted as pursuits calculated to be "beneficial in their effects on the system." Unfortunately it often happens that a large majority of the audience are at issue with a lecturer when he ceases to state facts, and brings forth his own opinions; but as they cannot answer him, this antagonistic feeling is never evinced. So when Mr. Binns proceeded to show the "habits of the mole," and afterwards described the kind of insect from which emanates the sound termed the "death-watch," it is just possible that very many of his auditors would have infinitely preferred to listen to a musical composition of one of the great composers, even if it did not, like natural history, "enrich both the body and the mind." As we have already said, we cannot tell whether the stage of musical development at which Mr. Binns has arrived reflects that of the town at which he lectured; but, if so, we may say that Batley and its neighbourhood present a rich field for the labours of a zealous musical missionary.

The discussion initiated in the pages of the Musical Times upon the subject of Degrees in Music has led to excellent results. Some professors, who, either through design or ignorance, had assumed a title to which they had no recognised right, have now withdrawn it, and others have resolutely maintained that significant silence which is a sufficient reply to all inconvenient inquiries. But, with as earnest a desire that the status of a musician should be acknowledged as that the want of it should be exposed, we counsel all who are brought professionally into contact with those who place "Royal Academy of Music" after their names to ask for and peruse the certificate granted to students on leaving that Institution after completing their education. We have no wish here to mention persons—nor indeed can our remarks upon the matter affect any whose reputation it is desirable to uphold—but our experience leads us to believe that, were the method here advocated universally pursued, many names now inseparably united with the letters R.A.M. would appear without them, and many brass plates would disappear from certain doors. We would also be glad to know on what plea the term "Professor" is assumed by those who have never gained that distinction. It is certainly true that every man who professes a certain thing is a "professor;" but the term in music is a title, and, in the Royal Academy of Music, not one of the eminent teachers employed is so styled unless he has earned the right to such designation. Of course no man who thus blinds the public can blind himself to the character of the means he employs to do so; and those who are not thus deceived cannot but feel that the bare assumption of this prefix by a musician of any standing is scarcely a matter to be proud of when side by side with his name at many of our suburban Concert Halls stands that of another "professor" who happens to be a ventriloquist.

Amongst the many tricks of trade, we know of no one more extensively resorted to than that of offering an inexpensive article as a gift, on condition that an expensive one is purchased at the same time. Hitherto this system has been pursued by publicans, grocers, milkmen, and other tradesmen who supply "creature comforts" in poor neighbourhoods, with the hope of forcing a business which begins to show unmistakable signs of flagging; but we are certainly somewhat surprised to find, by an announcement now before us, headed "How to obtain music gratis," that such a method of attracting attention is by no means confined to particular localities, nor to any especial class of shopkeepers. In this advertisement we are informed that "any customer purchasing five shillings' worth of sale music will be entitled to receive, free of charge, a copy of either of the four following celebrated works," and then the names of two songs and two pianoforte solos are given to choose from. But this is not all the boon conferred upon the artistic public by this benevolent publisher; for a "great sale of music" (terms cash only), at ruinous prices, is also offered, although the ominous line that "none of the music can be exchanged under any circumstances" sufficiently proves that there is a limit to the generosity of all men. Considering that by purchasing five shillings' worth of pieces (the prices of which are very considerably reduced) you may receive one composition (the published price only of which is marked), the rush of customers will doubtless be overwhelming; and it is to be regretted, therefore, that this "great sale" is only to last a fortnight. There is every hope, however, that with a little gentle pressure from the public, the proprietor of this establishment may be induced to relent, and allow the sale to extend over a great many more fortnights.

Those who are anxious to promote the diffusion of good pianoforte music amongst the young must have been struck with the advertisements of "Teaching Pieces" daily appearing in our newspapers. It might reasonably be imagined that the Sonatinas, Rondos, Airs with variations, and other compositions of this class which have been bequeathed to us by English as well as foreign writers, are as excellent "Teaching Pieces" as can be supplied by the prolific composers of the day; and it is right therefore to make it known that the works which are thus named (not by the authors, we believe, but by the publishers) are professedly written for the purpose of enabling a pupil to make a great show at a very small expenditure of executive power. That this system strikes at the root of solid and artistic training, both of the hand and mind, cannot admit of a doubt; but superficial music props up superficial teaching, and the supply will always keep pace with the demand. An examination of the masters, instead of the pupils, in some of our educational establishments may come some day; and then we shall see how it happens that many, who are supposed by their parents and guardians to perform "brilliant pieces," cannot even play a scale. The dissemination of elementary works by accredited professors, which is now proceeding so vigorously, will no doubt open the eyes of thinking men to the truth; and those who live by perverting it must then either mend their ways or resign their trust. In a healthy state of the art, children would be taught healthy compositions; and "drawing-room music" would be but a development of "nursery music."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE short winter season of Italian Opera at this establishment came to a close on Saturday the 15th ult.; but two extra nights were given in the following week, Monday introducing Madame Trebelli as Nancy, in "Marta," and Tuesday being for the benefit of the lessee. The question as to whether there is a public for Italian Opera out of the regular season, at moderate prices of admission, has now been satisfactorily answered, for on each evening the house has been crowded. The representations of all the Operas have been, on the whole, satisfactory, the roughness and uncertainty occasionally observable being no doubt attributable to the fact of the works being given without sufficient preparation, and the orchestral performers being unused to playing under the Conductor. These matters will of course be remedied, should the experiment be repeated. We can very well afford to pass through the season without Verdi's "Forza del Destino;" but why should Mr. Mapleson tell us that he has consulted "the interests of connoisseurs and of the public" in not producing it? If his audiences have shown that they prefer the stock Operas to a novelty, surely the lessee has consulted his own interests in the matter, and it would have been infinitely better, therefore, to say nothing about it.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE musical association which engages to present a new work to any public for the first time undertakes a serious responsibility. To itself, for example, is owing all that labour and care can do in the way of sustaining or enhancing reputation by so conspicuous a means. To the composer is owing the fullest service, lest injustice be done, and to the public the same lest false impressions be formed. We have every reason to think that Mr. Barnby and the managers of the above-named Society bore these things in mind when resolving upon the production of Professor Macfarren's "Joseph." Mr. Barnby has given too many proofs of zeal and devotion to allow misgivings with regard to himself at any rate, and, if his co-workers are sensible men, they defer to his judgment on all musical matters. Yet, in point of fact, the desire that "Joseph" might receive ample justice was partially foiled by the wish to produce the work without delay—a very natural and laudable wish in every such case, though sometimes inconvenient. We hear that the Oratorio received six ordinary choir rehearsals and three or four special ones, at which the attendance was not large. Looking at the difficulty of the music, and after making allowance for the ability of the chorus and the training powers of the Conductor, this would, primâ facie, seem to us hardly enough for an absolute assurance of the best results. Nor, in truth, were the best results forthcoming—at all events so must have thought those who were able to compare what was done with the magnificent performance at Leeds. The chorus often lacked confidence, and therefore decision, while appearing to be so much engrossed in the mere reading of the text as to have no thought for the shades of musical and dramatic expression which should be as closely observed by a choralist as by a solo singer. Nor was the band altogether perfect, while, by an unfortunate coincidence, several of the principal artists fell below par. For Madame Patey, who was suffering from cold, an apology had to be circulated. Madame Sherrington sang with much less than her old power; Mr. Santley, who is understood to dislike the hall, was feeble, nor did Signor Foli omit to keep him in countenance. Altogether, therefore, the first presentation of "Joseph" to Londoners cannot be considered a happy, though undoubtedly it was an interesting, event, as the presence of a crowd of musical and artistic notables testified. But the reception of the work gave its composer no reason for discontent. A good many of the numbers, especially the chorus of Ishmaelites and that of the Egyptians, in which they acclaim the elevation of Joseph, were loudly applauded, as was, thanks to Mr. E. Lloyd's excellent singing not less than to its own merits, the expressive Air of Reuben, "Let us not kill him." At the close, Professor Macfarren was called to the platform and applauded with a fervour which left no doubt either of the esteem in which he is held, or the admiration his work had commanded. All the same is it our duty to state in plain terms that the rendering of "Joseph," though good, having in view the time devoted to preparation, was not one fairly illustrative of the effects possible to the music.

With regard to the Oratorio itself, it would be superfluous to discuss again those points which so recently occupied the attention of our Special Correspondent at the Leeds Festival. The defects which then attracted notice on all hands are not, as it seems to us, removed by further acquaintance, while those of the libretto have acquired greater prominence. It is undoubtedly true that Dr. Monk selected and arranged the scenes from the life of his hero with judgment, but he erred, as experience now shows, in adhering to the language of Scripture for his extended dramatic dialogues. Sometimes, indeed, the effect of transforming the narrative into dialogue approaches dangerously near the ludicrous, and we can only wonder that two men of such taste and sense as Drs. Monk and Macfarren allowed the result to meet the public eye. However, the mischief is done and cannot now very well be obviated. The music of "Joseph," taken as a whole, commends itself more and more as the work of a powerful thinker and a learned musician—one, moreover, who knows how at times, though not often enough, to be tender and graceful withal. This is the general impression made by an attentive hearing, nevertheless we are sensible of defects. The construction of the music puts too much strain upon the mind of the listener, because there are in it too few points of repose. Then there is often a sense of hardness and dryness, caused by the predominance of intellect over feeling; and, with it, a sense of restlessness due to the ever-shifting tonality which enters so much into the composer's method. But, all these things notwithstanding, "Joseph" is an Oratorio such as few, if any, among living musicians could write; and, if we cannot hail it as faultless, it is a simple duty to value the work as a most important contribution to art, and as a successful vindication of native talent.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

A LARGE audience assembled at Exeter Hall on the 14th ult.; for the attraction of "Judas Maccabæus," as given by the Sacred Harmonic Society, is to real Handel-lovers even greater than that of "Israel in Egypt," the union of redundant orchestral and choral power being more in sympathy with the subject of the former than of the latter work. Still we cannot admit that brass instruments, in combination with voices, should be blown as if the sole object were to crush, rather than to aid, the grand vocal effects of Handel's original score; and if, therefore, Sir Michael Costa's "additional accompaniments" (so skilful and appropriate in many of the best choruses) are to be heard in all their integrity in the Oratorios of Handel which this Society has done so much to popularise, we may at least express a hope that the vigour of those who wield the noisiest of the wind instruments should be placed under wholesome control. In every respect the choir shows unmistakable signs of improvement; indeed, we doubt whether the uniformly excellent manner in which the choruses of "Judas Maccabæus" were given may not be placed upon record as the best choral achievement yet accomplished by this Association. We may mention "Hear us, O Lord," "Fall'n is the foe," and "We never will bow down" as especially worthy of the warmest commendation, all the points being brought out with remarkable clearness and precision. The solo vocalists acquitted themselves to the entire satisfaction of the audience; but the honours of the evening fell to Mr. E. Lloyd (who replaced Mr. Vernon Rigby, absent from indisposition), his singing of "Call forth thy powers" being so admirable as to elicit an enthusiastic encore, and the vigorous "Sound an alarm" being received in a manner which must have convinced the singer of the hold he has now securely obtained over the most exacting audiences. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington's best solo was "From mighty kings;" Miss Julia Wigan was highly effective in "So shall the lute and harp awake" (which she sang better than the well-known "Pious orgies"); Miss Julia Elton gave "Father of heaven" with much purity of expression; and Mr. Montem Smith and Mr. Lewis Thomas (the latter rendering "The Lord worketh wonders" with much intelligence) were most efficient in all the music allotted to them. Sir Michael Costa conducted with his accustomed care and decision.

MR. PROUT'S NEW SYMPHONY.

WE shall offer no apology for giving the Symphony in G minor by Mr. Ebenezer Prout (produced at the Crystal Palace since our last issue) a notice apart. There may be some oddly constituted folk who combine with an anxiety for the development of native talent a wish to throw cold water upon it when it appears; but, as we are unaware of their existence, it is allowable to assume that no effort to render the uttermost honour to an English composer which he has fairly earned will be accounted superfluous.

Mr. Prout, besides writing music himself, criticises the writings of others, and often signs his verdicts with his own sign manual. We know, therefore, what his opinions are upon matters of high artistic moment, and are well assured that he is a man of catholic sympathies. Mr. Prout has preached amongst us the gospel of the moderns with edifying enthusiasm. He can admire Wagner heart and soul, and, just as Mr. Gladstone keeps his mind "open" about vaccination laws or any other social mistake that may be pointed out to him on a postcard, so does Mr. Prout keep his mind open to the beauties of Tschaikowsky and others whom that appalling Slav represents. All this is praiseworthy, for a man should be ready to appreciate the beautiful in whatever form it appears; but, as a rule, when a composer admires modern tendencies he is impelled to illustrate them by his works. This may be accounted for by the irresistible attraction of the style and methods characteristic of advanced orchestral music, and the comparative ease with which the symbols of "sound and fury" can be put on paper. But Mr. Prout is a conspicuous exception. He projects his admiration even into the Zukunft, but his labours are carried on in the region of the classic past; and, while seeing much to praise in a Tschaikowsky, he prefers to write Symphonies as clear and symmetrical as those of a Mozart. This is excellent, and heartily do we wish that others would follow so good an example, for when our composers follow pure models in practice it is a matter of indifference what they can find to praise in theory. The Symphony in G minor is, as regards construction and style, built on the noblest lines of the great masters, and, if for this reason alone, presents a claim to our regard. So far, at any rate, there can be nothing better, and all we have to do is to see whether the ideas thus enshrined are worthy of the fashion in which they are expressed.

The form of the opening movement (Allegro moderato e con fuoco, G minor, $\frac{3}{4}$) is as compact and symmetrical as that of Mozart in the same key, while illustrating the care Mr. Prout takes to make the most of his materials. He never sucks the orange and throws it away. On the contrary, every idea that comes to him is used up with praiseworthy economy of resource, and with corresponding advantage to the unity and intelligibleness of the work. The movement begins with an emphatic exordium, wherein the dominant and tonic chords, given out staccato, with full orchestral power, are the chief feature. This introduces a melodious leading theme for first violins and flute, followed by a Tutti notable on account of the effective manner in which a descending diatonic passage of semiquavers is suddenly arrested on E flat, that note, as a dominant pedal, sustaining a graceful episodical theme. The Tutti is generally marked by much vigour, if not novelty, and, closing on the dominant of B flat, leads well up to the second theme in its orthodox key. The new melody is not quite as pronounced a contrast to its predecessor as some may desire, but it is very tuneful, and its announcement by the wind alone has a grateful effect. This having been repeated by the strings, the peroration of the first half of the movement is at once entered upon, and introduces some new matter, immensely vigorous, and made all the more effective by the terseness of its enunciation. The composer has now set forth his "argument," and in looking upon it we are struck by the fact—so rare in a modern orchestral piece—that not a word has been wasted. The first part of the Allegro in Beethoven's "Fifth" is hardly more concentrated, and so, having clearly in mind what is to be developed, we pass on to the "free Fantasia" that opens the second part. Here Mr. Prout begins, as others have done before him, by drawing for a few bars upon the peroration just alluded to, after which the leading theme appears in the wood wind, while the strings are amusing themselves by tossing about a short independent phrase. From this a leap back is made to the distinctive chords of the exordium, which enter with a crash in C sharp minor, that key being rapidly reached enharmonically from C minor through A flat. Next, the second theme is introduced (in C major) by the bassoon, the other members of the wood wind following with snatches of the same melody. Then we have again the matter of the peroration tied in the bonds of double counterpoint to the descending diatonic passage already mentioned, after which we return once more to the introductory chords, passing from them over a new legato phrase, as by a bridge, to a short dominant pedal, and the usual réprise of the principal themes, now variously modified and pleasantly redistributed among the instruments. The new treatment of the chief motif, and the episode connecting this with its subordinate, are as fanciful as anything in the "Fantasia" proper, but never go beyond a legitimate development of materials already accumulated. The second theme is dismissed without expansion, and after it the movement reaches a grand climax with the peroration of its first part, now in the tonic major. At this point we look for a working up to the Coda, which Mr. Prout does in leisurely fashion, not only giving a new episodical motif, but making large use of the exordium, as well as of his leading themes. The sudden reintroduction of the suave and gentle second melody (by the wood upon a tonic pedal) in the midst of the Coda is a happy thought and has a striking effect. Looking upon the entire movement, we must admire its workmanship heartily. It is that of a musician who has the scores of the masters at his fingers' ends.

Mr. Prout is fond of using strings and wind in alternation, and indulges this fondness at the opening of his slow movement (Larghetto espressivo, E flat, $\frac{2}{4}$), the principal melody of which—one as gentle and tuneful as Schubert himself could desire—is first played by the violins con sordini, and next by flute and clarionet. It is of considerable length, and we have it rehearsed twice in full without change of key, though with various modifications of "colour," before a subordinate appears. The new-comer is divided phrase by phrase among the wind, to a tremolando accompaniment of strings. Others follow in succession, all more or less similar as to general character, for the movement is singularly unvaried by the gusts of passion which often disturb the placid surface of its kind. Finally the original melody returns, and upon it the movement peacefully dies away. There is but little in this Larghetto expressive of profound feeling—nothing that goes to the heart and moves it. But there is much that charms the senses, while the musician can listen with the additional pleasure that springs from the contemplation of an artistic work. In the Scherzo (Allegro molto, C minor, $\frac{3}{4}$) Mr. Prout again makes the strings and wind carry on a dialogue; the former with anger and agitation, the latter with something of placidity, the whole with effect. There are two Trios, one in A flat, the other in F, both necessarily contrasting with the Scherzo proper, but not differing from each other so widely as might be with advantage. Whenever this form appears it is primâ facie for the sake of contrast, the admirable effect of which cannot be too studiously produced. As regards the music per se, too much cannot be said in praise of its transparent clearness. Like the rest of the Symphony, the Scherzo is never obscure, and we feel that it conveys everything the composer intended.

The strings lead off the Finale (Vivace assai, G minor, $\frac{4}{4}$) with a bustling theme which somehow gives rise to agreeable expectations; just as Haydn's openings, according to the degree in which they are bucolic, prepare us for a setting forth of his invention and contrapuntal skill. We scarcely anticipate, however, what in this case follows a spirited exposition of the motif. The second violins, attended by the violas with a counterpoint of quavers, give out a new subject in semibreves and minims for fugal treatment. But no fugue is intended. As soon as the theme has "flown" through all the divisions of strings, a Tutti is reached, generated by the leading motif, and followed by an episode wherein the brass instruments come, for the first time, well to the front. The stateliness here shown is in excellent contrast with the activity which precedes and comes after. Duly heralded, the principal subject now makes its first re-entry, followed by a second and happily varied episode, for wind and strings in alternation. A portion of this new theme is afterwards cleverly worked in with the fugal subject, while a bustling counterpoint of quavers sustains the main character of the movement. The leading motif next makes its second re-entry, followed by the Tutti already referred to, and by the episode for the "brass" as well as by the combined themes. Then we have the third re-entry of the principal subject, leading to a preparation for the Coda in the form of an extended dominant pedal, upon which Mr. Prout exercises his counterpoint with capital effect. Continuing, with unabated vigour, the movement is closed by an emphatic reiteration of the main theme. This is undoubtedly the finest section of the work, its claim to that honour being based upon cleverness of construction, well-contrasted effects, and a sustaining power such as nowadays is rarely displayed. If on account of its Finale alone, the Symphony deserves a cordial welcome and ungrudged honour.

To sum up, we have in this work a capital specimen of finished and classical musicianship, only needing profound intellectuality and intense emotionalism to be great. Will Mr. Prout, equipped as he is with all that art can bestow, move up into the higher regions of breathing thought and burning word? Who knows? He is in the vigour of his powers and the full flush of his ambition. Anyhow, there is every reason to cheer him on his course.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

Herr Wilhelmj made his first appearance at this establishment during the present season on the 8th ult. He selected for performance Raff's Violin Concerto in B minor, Op. 161, a work which had not before been heard in England. It cannot be considered in any way one of the composer's most successful efforts. Raff writes too much for his own reputation. His published works already reach beyond Op. 200; and while there are many, such as his Second, Third, and Fourth Symphonies, parts of his "Lenore," his Piano Concerto in C minor, and others which might be named, undoubtedly establishing his right to be considered one of the leading composers of the day, there are also many others in which cleverness of treatment is used to conceal poverty of invention. Such a work in our opinion is the Violin Concerto. Both the solo instrument and the orchestra are skilfully handled; but there is hardly a thought in the piece which one would care to hear a second time. The applause which followed its conclusion was a tribute rather to the excellence of the performance than to the merits of the composition. Later in the programme Herr Wilhelmj played a Concertstück of his own for violin and orchestra—a show-piece of no great musical value. The orchestral performances on this afternoon included the "Zauberflöte" Overture, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, and Liszt's brilliant transcription for orchestra of his fourth "Rhapsodie Hongroise." That all received full justice under Mr. Manns need hardly be said. The vocalists were Madame Matilda Savertal, a lady with a powerful and sympathetic soprano voice, who made her first appearance at the Palace on this occasion, and Signor Foli.

Mr. J. L. Hatton's new sacred Drama "Hezekiah" occupied the entire concert on the 15th—the last before Christmas. Mr. Hatton has obtained so high and well-deserved a reputation as a composer of songs and part-songs, that a very natural curiosity was felt as to how he would succeed in sacred music. It cannot be said that "Hezekiah" will add any fresh lustre to his fame. That it is melodious and flowing will be expected by all; the workmanship also shows a practised hand, though there is little display of contrapuntal skill. Mr. Hatton seems to have intentionally written down to the level of amateur Choral Societies, and he will probably have his reward in the popularity of his work with such Associations; but of individuality of style or of freshness of idea we find very few traces. The best description we can give of the music is to say that it is throughout pretty but commonplace. It is no more than justice to add that it is thoroughly well written for the voices, and that it affords the soloists good opportunity for legitimate display. The performance was a very good one; the Crystal Palace Choir sang well throughout, and the solo music could not have been in safer hands than those of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Emma Reimar, Madame Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The work was well received, and the composer was called for at the close of the performance and warmly applauded.

In addition to the Saturday Concerts, an interesting musical event of the past month has been the revival on the 12th ult. of Cimarosa's "Il Matrimonio Segreto" under the title of "The Secret Marriage." The English version has been ably adapted by Mr. W. Grist, and the charming, though in parts old-fashioned, music was on the whole excellently performed. As regards acting, the first mention should be made of the Geronimo of Mr. Richard Temple, which was a most amusing impersonation, while in the singing Madame Cave-Ashton, as Carolina, carried off the palm. The other characters were sustained by Mr. George Fox, who sang well as the Count; and Mr. Bernard Lane (Paolino), Madame Alice Barth (Elisetta), and Miss Florence St. John (Fidalma) were all more or less satisfactory. The performance was repeated on the 17th.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Only three of these Concerts (besides the usual performances on Saturday afternoons) were given during last month, previous to the adjournment for the Christmas vacation, viz. on the 3rd, 10th, and 17th respectively. On the first evening mentioned the chamber music consisted of Cherubini's Quartett in D minor for stringed instruments and Mendelssohn's Quartett in B minor (Op. 3) for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, the rendering of both works having been admirable throughout. Herr Straus occupied the post of leading violinist, and a promising young artist, Mdlle. Dora Schirmacher, presided at the pianoforte. It is but rarely now that the chamber works, together with many others of the sterling compositions of the composer of "Les Deux Journées," obtain a hearing, but their performance, when it occurs, is none the less welcome. It is the depth and clearness of conception and the absolute mastery he exercises over a variety of forms which—apart from his dramatic and Church music—render the works of the Florentine maestro of the highest importance to the student of classical music, and it is a matter of great regret that they should remain in such sore need of a general revival. Besides the above two Quartetts the programme included a Romance for violin by Max Bruch, played with much refinement of taste by Herr Straus, and a Sonata (C major, Op. 2) for pianoforte by Beethoven, in the rendering of which Mdlle. Schirmacher's exceptional talent appeared to the best advantage, and she was much and deservedly applauded. Mr. Santley was the vocalist. The second Concert of the month commenced with Mozart's Quartett in C major (the last of the set dedicated by the composer to Joseph Haydn) in which Madame Norman-Néruda was associated with Messrs. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. The pianist on this occasion was Mr. Charles Hallé, who met with a very warm reception, and played with his accustomed lucidity and brilliancy Schubert's noble, if somewhat diffuse, Fantasia in C major. Another feature in the evening's programme was supplied by Madame Norman-Néruda, who in her performance of a Sonata (D minor) by Rust—a contemporary of Ph. E. Bach—worked a veritable revival among the quaint old dance movements of the primitive Sonata, showing them to be capable of imparting a good deal more than mere rhythmical meaning. Pergolesi's well-known Sicilienne, and songs by Bach and Haydn, were exceedingly well rendered by Mdlle. Friedländer, who appears to have become quite a favourite at these concerts; and the evening concluded with Beethoven's Variations, written for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, on Wenzel Müller's once popular Air "Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu." Mr. Charles Hallé, Madame Norman-Néruda, and Signor Piatti were the executants. Sir Julius Benedict acted as the accompanist. At the last of the three concerts under notice Madame Norman-Néruda was again the principal violinist in Schubert's Stringed Quintett in C major (Op. 163) and Brahms's Quartett in G minor for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, Miss Zimmermann having been the pianist in the latter work, one of the most remarkable of the kind which "young Germany" has produced. Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, and Sterndale Bennett's Rondo Piacevole, were played with great artistic refinement by Miss Zimmermann, the latter piece receiving an encore, to which the lady responded by the brilliant performance of the same composer's playful "musical sketch" known as the "Fountain." Mdlle. Friedländer sang with much effect Lieder by Schubert, Schumann, and Hiller, infusing, however, to our thinking, too much dramatic pathos into the words of the simple Volkslied by the latter composer. The lady was encored in her last song, and, as on previous occasions, repeated the concluding verse, a custom which we had hoped was gradually disappearing from our concert-rooms. Such fragmentary repetitions disturb the unity of the work performed (and it matters little whether it be a simple song or a more ambitious composition) and rather weaken than enhance the effect previously produced by the performer. Encores, in our opinion, should either be declined altogether or replied to by an additional number. MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti, and Madame Néruda, assisted in the execution of the chamber music, which, it is hardly necessary to add, was most admirably performed. Mr. Zerbini was a very efficient accompanist. The next concert will take place on Monday evening, the 7th inst.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN orchestral Concert by the students of this Institution was given on the 13th ult., at St. James's Hall, before a large audience. The two compositions by the pupils—the first movement of a Symphony in G minor by R. Addison, and a Quartett and Chorus by G. Hooper—were highly favourable specimens of the manner in which this branch of study is cultivated in the Academy; the former being remarkably clear and cleverly instrumented, and the latter (especially the unaccompanied Quartett) melodious and well written for the voices. All the pianists were exceptionally good; Miss Ethel Goold especially, in the Romance and Rondo from Chopin's Concerto in E minor, displaying a refined touch and executive facility which elicited the warmest marks of approbation. Miss Ellis, in the first movement of Hummel's Concerto in E, and Miss Boxell, in the first movement of Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, were also most favourably received; and the rendering of the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto by Miss De Nolte (who now holds one of the "Professors' Scholarships") reflected the utmost credit both upon herself and her instructor. Signor Randegger's dramatic Scena, "Medea," was effectively sung by Mrs. Crosmond Turner; Miss Clara Samuell gave with much purity of style Mozart's "Vedrai carino;" and concerted pieces were sung by Misses Leonora Braham and Orridge, Messrs. Welch, Theiler, and Hutchinson. The first and second parts of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" were well given, the solo parts being most carefully rendered by Misses Leonora Braham and Orridge, Messrs. Welch and Robert George. The band and choir were so thoroughly efficient as to fully evidence the care with which the work had been prepared. The concert was, as usual, under the able directorship of Mr. Walter Macfarren.

THE competition for the "Thalberg" Scholarship was held at the Royal Academy of Music, on the 17th ult. The examiners were Mr. W. Dorrell, Mr. Walter Macfarren, Mr. A. Randegger, Mr. Brinley Richards, and the Principal (Professor Macfarren). There were twenty-three candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Alice Heathcote. The competition for the "Novello" Scholarship took place on the same day. The examiners were Mr. Barnby, Mr. H. C. Lunn, and the Principal. There were seven candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to William Sewell. The competition for the "Balfe" Scholarship took place on the 18th ult. The examiners were Mr. H. C. Banister, Mr. H. C. Lunn, Mr. A. Randegger, Dr. Steggall, and the Principal (Professor Macfarren). There were six candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Percy Stranders. The competition for the "Westmorland" Scholarship and "Potter" Exhibition was afterwards held. The examiners were Mr. F. R. Cox, Mr. H. C. Lunn, Mr. Walter Macfarren, Mr. A. Randegger, Dr. Steggall, and the Principal. There were eighteen candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Marian Williams (re-elected). The "Potter" Exhibition, for which there were eight candidates, was awarded to F. W. W. Bampfylde.

THE usual special services have been held at St. Anne's, Soho, on the Friday evenings during Advent, Bach's Cantata, "My spirit was in heaviness," being given, with the accompaninent of a small orchestra, in place of the Anthem. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were by Dr. Garrett in F, and in these as well as in the hymns at the commencement and conclusion of the service, the orchestra was employed. The tenor solos were given by Mr. Charles Wade with much refinement; Master Andrews and Mr. Greaves singing the soprano and bass solos, and notably the beautiful Duet, "Come, my Saviour," with care and intelligence. The choir, under the direction of Mr. J. Barnby, rendered the Choruses very efficiently, the effect of the concluding Chorus of praise being extremely fine. Mr. J. M. Coward presided at the organ. The Princess of Wales was present at the last service. A portion of Bach's Christmas Oratorio will be performed, with orchestral accompaniment, under the direction of Mr. Barnby, on Friday evenings, the 4th, 11th, and 18th inst., at eight o'clock.

THE first concert of the second season of the Grove Park Choral Society, Chiswick, took place on the 4th ult. at the New Vestry Hall, Turnham Green, before a numerous and appreciative audience. The opening part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character, consisting chiefly of vocal solos and some part-singing, while the pièce de resistance of the evening, which occupied the entire second part, was Mr. Cowen's Cantata "The Rose-Maiden," a work admirably suited to the limited capacities of a newly formed choir. The performance was a good one throughout, and bore testimony to the progress made by the Society since last season, under its able and energetic Conductor Mr. Theodore Drew. The incidental solos were well rendered by members of the choir. Miss Wyatt was the accompanist, and delivered herself of a somewhat arduous task in a thoroughly musicianlike manner. The second concert of the Society will be given in the early part of the present month.

WE regret to record the death of M. Alexandre François Debain, the celebrated pianoforte and harmonium manufacturer, which occurred in Paris on the 3rd ult. His extraordinary talent for the mechanical arts manifested itself when very young, and he entered the musical instrument trade in his sixteenth year. Space would not allow us to chronicle half his inventions; but we may say that amongst other things he constructed a mechanical organ-tree, fourteen feet high, the branches of which were full of birds that fluttered about and sang. He was the inventor of the Harmonium, the Stenographone (an instrument designed to note down music as it is being executed upon the keyboard), the Concertina, and the Antiphonel, which was played with a handle, plates, with the music marked out with points of iron, being placed in succession upon an apparatus which adapted itself to the keyboard. He also invented a new ballot-box for voting, which was adopted by the Assembly in its sitting of the 6th May, 1850.

SPECIAL SERVICES were held in Christ Church, Mayfair, on Advent Sunday. At the morning service the Canticles were sung to Dykes in F and Garrett in F. The responses used were the Ferial Responses, edited by J. Barnby; and the Anthem was Dr. Stainer's "Hosannah in the highest." At evensong the choir had the co-operation of some members of St. Paul's Cathedral Choir. The Canticles were sung to Clarke-Whitfeld in E, the responses used being the same as in the morning. Two Anthems, "Who is this" (Dr. Arnold), and the "Bell Anthem," by Henry Purcell, were effectively rendered. Mr. R. Stokoe, F.C.O., the Organist and Choirmaster of the church, presided at the organ, and played the accompaniments and voluntaries with great taste and accuracy. The sermon in the evening was preached by the Rev. Cosmo Gordon, D.D.

A CONCERT was given at the John Street Schools, Stoke Newington, on Wednesday evening, the 19th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. James Williams. The programme opened with a performance of Wells's Cantata, "Peace and War," which was rendered with good effect. The solos were sung by Miss Isabel Burton, Mrs. Clew, Mr. Pain, and Mr. Murray. Miss Burton gained an encore in "'Tis sweet to stroll," and Mrs. Clew was greatly applauded for her rendering of "When will battles cease." "Thoughts of home," sung by Mr. Pain, was redemanded. Most of the choruses were well given, the "Battle Chorus" being unanimously encored. The second part was miscellaneous. Mrs. Rutland and Mr. Prentice presided at the pianoforte and harmonium.

A SERIES of five orchestral and vocal Concerts will be given by Madame Jenny Viard-Louis, at St. James's Hall, the classical nature of which must entitle them to special attention. There will be four monthly morning concerts, commencing in February, and one in the evening on the 26th of June. The orchestra will comprise ninety eminent performers, under the direction of Mr. Weist Hill; and the programme will be selected from the works of the best composers. The pianoforte part in the Concertos will be sustained by Madame Viard-Louis. An orchestral composition by Max Bruch will be included in the series; and several new works by English composers are promised.

MESSRS. NOVELLO, EWER and Co., in continuation of their octavo series of Handel's works, are about to publish "The Triumph of Time and Truth," "Semele," and "The Passion of Christ" (Brockes' version). Dr. Crotch's "Palestine" is also in preparation. The last-named Oratorio has been recently resuscitated with much success by the Sacred Harmonic Society; but all the above-mentioned compositions of Handel are so little known that, in addition to the probability of their issue in a cheap form leading to their public performance, a real benefit will be conferred upon those students to whom these works have been hitherto almost inaccessible.

THE competition for the "Novello" Scholarship at the National Training School for Music was held on the 19th ult. The examiners were Mr. Barnby, Dr. Arthur Sullivan (Principal of the school), Dr. Stainer, and Mr. Alberto Visetti. There were seven candidates. The scholarship was awarded to James Farquharson Walenn. At the same time Miss Charlotte E. Cobb was elected, out of seven candidates, to the vacant scholarship of the Clothworkers' Company.

ON Thursday evening, November 29th, the members of the Voluntary Choir at Christ Church, Newgate Street, London, presented their Hon. Sec., Mr. J. T. Salmon, with a handsomely bound Church Service and Haydn's Dictionary of the Bible, as a memento of their esteem and congratulation on his recovery from a serious illness. Mr. J. T. Cooper, the Organist and Choirmaster, addressed a few words to Mr. Salmon, who responded in suitable terms.

A CONCERT was given by the boys of Christ's Hospital, in the Great Hall, on the 19th ult., which was numerously attended. Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was the principal item in the first part; and the second and third parts included several well-known part-songs, all of which were well rendered. Vocal solos were also given, and the band performed some popular selections, which were much admired.

A CONCERT was given by the members of the London Vocal Union, at the South Place Institute, on Tuesday evening, November 27th, under the direction of Mr. George Wells, when his new Cantata, "Peace and War," was performed. The solos were sung by Miss Lilian Barrett, Miss Marian Burke, Mr. Baker, and Mr. Robinson. Miss Fanny Henman was a very efficient accompanist.

THE City Temple Choral Society gave a very successful Concert on Thursday the 13th ult., under the direction of Mr. E. Minshall, who presided at the organ. The soloists were Miss Marian Williams, R.A.M., Miss Margaret Hancock, Mr. Sydney Tower, and Mr. Duncan James. The choruses were rendered with precision, and the organ solos were a feature in the programme.

THE South Norwood Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Praise Jehovah" on the 17th ult., together with a good miscellaneous selection. Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Bawtree, Mr. Charles Hill, and Mr. R. Brown sang the solo music, and Mr. W. J. Westbrook conducted.

WE are informed that Messrs. Schott and Co. will issue immediately the following new works by Richard Wagner: the poem of his new music-drama, "Parsifol; ein Bühnenweihfestspiel;" "Siegfried-Idyll," for small orchestra; and a Sketch for a Pianoforte Sonata.

THE Brixton Choral Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. W. Lemare, performed Dr. Macfarren's Oratorio, "Joseph," at the Angell Town Institution, on the 17th ult.

WE read in a New York paper that Mr. P. S. Gilmore and his famous band announce their final tour of 100 concerts from Maine to California previous to their departure for Europe.

MR. W. T. BEST gave an interesting Organ Recital on the large organ in the City Temple on Tuesday, November 27th. Miss Agnes Larkcom was the vocalist.

REVIEWS.

Drei Lieder, von H. Heine, für eine Singstimme mit Begleitung des Pianoforte. Componirt von A. C. Mackenzie, Op. 14. [Leipzig: C. F. Kahnt.]

MR. MACKENZIE is already well known to musicians by some of his previous works. We particularly remember a Pianoforte Quartett of his, which has been more than once heard in London, and we have also seen various smaller pieces from his pen, which show him to be a musician of more than average attainments. We were at first somewhat disposed to cavil at the fact of an English musician ignoring his own language entirely in the title of the above songs, though we ought to add that an English version is given in addition to the original German text; but on examining the music we felt that Mr. Mackenzie was perfectly justified in the choice of a German title. These three songs are as thoroughly German in character as if they had been written by Schumann, who seems to be the composer's model. We find not the slightest trace of the English or Scotch style in any one number. Moreover we are pleased to be able to say that there is nothing commonplace or vulgar about the music; we see throughout the hand of a refined and thoughtful musician. Of the three songs, the second "Die Wellen blinken," with its alternations of $\frac{6}{8}$ and $\frac{9}{8}$ time, is perhaps on the whole our favourite; but all are very good, though they will require finished singing and good accompanying to produce their proper effect.

The Jubilee Cantata. (Harvest Cantata.) For Solo Voices, Chorus, and Orchestra. Composed by C. M. von Weber. Edited and the pianoforte accompaniment revised by Ebenezer Prout. The words translated from the German version of Wendt, by the Rev. J. Troutbeck.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This Cantata, composed in 1818, for the fifteenth anniversary of the accession of the King of Saxony, was not performed on that occasion, owing to a cabal of the Italian clique, then all-powerful at the Saxon Court, but it was given a short time afterwards with decisive success. The original words by Friedrich Kind, author of the libretto of "Der Freischütz," were, however, found unsuitable for general performance, and a second text, entitled "Ernte-Cantate" (Harvest Cantata), was written to the music by Amadeus Wendt, an English version of which, by Hampdon Napier, entitled "The Festival of Peace," was prepared for the performance of the work, which took place under the direction of the composer at the Argyll Rooms on May 10, 1826. The last occasion on which this composition was given in England was at the Gloucester Festival in 1874; and then, despite the incongruity of allying sacred words with obviously secular music, an adaptation of the text suitable for a Cathedral, by Mr. F. W. Rosier, was used. In the edition now before us, a new translation, following Wendt's version very closely, has been supplied by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, and we are bound to say that in every respect this appears thoroughly satisfactory. Mr. Prout in his preface modestly says that as the pianoforte arrangement of the work was made by the composer himself, he has in no place tampered with it; but he has added metronome marks, and indicated the instrumentation throughout. The publication of the composition is well timed, for, under the direction of Mr. Prout, it is to be performed by the Borough of Hackney Choral Association in the course of the ensuing month.

God is our Refuge. (The Forty-sixth Psalm, Bible version.) The music composed for Solo Voices, Chorus, and Orchestra, by Edwin S. Such, Mus. Bac., Cantab.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

So appropriate and thoroughly musicianlike a setting of this psalm should find favour with those who do not sympathise with the startling and sensational effects which are gradually creeping into much of our Church music. Mr. Such expresses his text with remarkable clearness throughout; the opening Quartett and Chorus, the short Chorus in C minor, "The heathen raged," and the Quartett and Chorus, "Come, behold the works of the Lord"—the latter containing a highly effective change to the tonic major on the words "He maketh wars to cease"—being exceedingly favourable specimens of the composer's style. There is much good writing, too, in the final Chorus; but the best points of the work are those in which smoothness and purity, rather than elaboration, are the characteristic feature.

Song for the New Year. For Chorus and Orchestra. Composed by Robert Schumann. The English version translated from the German of Friedrich Rückert, and adapted by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, M.A.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This composition forms No. 9 of Schumann's posthumous works, and its publication in a cheap form at this appropriate season will be a real boon, as much to those already acquainted with its numerous beauties as to the many to whom it will appeal as a novelty. The music of this composer has now so firmly taken root in this country that even provincial Choral Associations will be glad to place one of his lesser known works in their concert programmes; and that this "Song for the New Year" is a happy specimen of Schumann's graceful and fluent style is freely admitted, even by the ardent admirers of his more elaborate dramatic compositions. The choral portions are interspersed with occasional Solos; and the work, although requiring careful preparation, is by no means difficult for even a moderately trained choir. The words are not only good in themselves, but skilfully adapted to the notes throughout, a merit especially observable in the passages of imitation.

The May Queen. A Pastoral. Written by Henry F. Chorley. Composed by Sir William Sterndale Bennett. The Choruses only. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The plan of issuing the Choruses only, in the compact octavo edition of standard choral works so long identified with the above firm, is one which we are certain will be cordially welcomed by Choral Societies. Already the whole of the Choruses in some of the most popular Oratorios have been published in this form; and as the series is to be continued, an opportunity will be afforded of accumulating, at a very small outlay, a musical library of the utmost practical value, the "vocal score, without accompaniment," being in fact the true handbook for the choir, as what is termed the "pianoforte score" is for the audience. It is unnecessary to say one word on the merits of Sterndale Bennett's beautiful Cantata now before us, for it has already securely taken its place as one of the most refined and melodious of the composer's works. The subject is essentially English, and the music happily reflects the pastoral surroundings of the unpretentious little poem, which, although fairly open to criticism as a literary work, is admirably laid out for the composer. In this edition not only are both the music and words clearly printed, but "leads" are given before the commencement of each Chorus, and also wherever the choir is silent, even for a few bars.

A Second and Third Book on the Theory of Music. Written especially for the use of the High Schools for Girls. By Louisa Gibson. [Weekes and Co.; Novello, Ewer and Co.; and Whittaker and Co.]

We have already favourably noticed this author's "First Book" on the same subject, and a careful perusal of the Second and Third Books convinces us that they are (with a few exceptions, which we shall point out) worthy of ranking with their predecessors. Something must first be said respecting the prefatory announcement that, "in the arrangement of subjects, the author has been principally guided by the requirements of the various examinations." That an author should be "principally guided" by an earnest desire to thoroughly ground a student in the subject of which a book treats is a fact which we should like to find universally admitted; but when we see so many works published avowedly written to enable pupils to pass examinations, we cannot but think it a sign that the system known as "cramming" is rather on the increase. As an instance of this, we have ourselves met with a pupil who was scarcely acquainted with the simplest chords, but who had nevertheless obtained the prize for "Harmony" at a College. When questioned on the subject, she told us all she knew about the matter was that she had got the "greatest number of marks;" so that it was evident she owed her reward not so much to her own talent as to the stupidity of her fellow-students. As the Second and Third Books of this series are devoted to an explanation of the theory of chords, the author will not be surprised if we become somewhat more critical than we found it necessary to be upon her Rudimentary Treatise. To commence with the Second Book, we think that some little revision of chapter iii. would be advisable; for, as it stands, it would somewhat puzzle a student to find out the difference between a "common chord" and a "triad," especially when we see the chords of F, major and minor, called "common chords," and those of G, major and minor (written in precisely the same manner), "triads." In the mind of a beginner (for of tyros only we are speaking) there would be certainly some confusion when he reads, at page 24, that a chord is inverted "if any note be placed below the original bass;" and, at page 42, if the lowest note be placed "above either of the upper notes." Two explanations are never advisable; and there is no doubt that the correct one is that an inversion is produced when any note of the chord except the root (not the "lowest note") is placed in the bass. It is said in chapter ix. that the augmented triad on the third degree of the minor scale requires "preparation," but we see no explanation as to what "preparation" means; and mention is made of the treatment of an "augmented fifth" in Examples 83 and 84, although no such interval occurs in either example. Indeed the whole of this chapter is fragmentary, for after mentioning a supertonic major triad in a minor key, and the "Neapolitan sixth," the subject is dismissed with the remark that "there are other chromatic concords, but being free in their progression they require no special notice." Other inaccuracies occur, as for instance at page 50, where, in the two examples in C minor, no indication is given of the dominant triads being major; but all these could be easily remedied. In the Third Book, although we are told that in the resolution of the dominant seventh "the seventh (subdominant), being the dissonant note, must fall one degree in the following chord," at page 10 (Ex. 1) we find it rising; and this fault is repeated in Example 61, although the ascent of the leading-note is carefully marked. In speaking of the "Chord of the Eleventh," it is said that it "may be resolved upon the tonic triad, or upon a supertonic discord;" but we contend that in the latter case the resolution of the eleventh takes place upon the following dominant harmony, and that in the former case it does not resolve at all. The explanation of Pedal Chords is clear enough; but the common notion that an upper holding note is necessarily an "inverted pedal" is here reproduced, Example 71, which is given as an illustration of these chords, merely showing us that the C, which is a component part of each harmony given, is held on instead of being played again. As it is said that this book is especially intended to contain the requisite information for those who desire to pass the Oxford and Cambridge Local Examinations, we think it would be well to reconsider some of the explanations of the "Various Forms of Composition," for if a student were to say that a fugue is "a composition consisting of one or more short subjects harmonised according to strict counterpoint, and with contrapuntal variations," we question whether he would fully satisfy the examiners. To inform us, too, that the word "tarantella" is derived from "tarantula, a spider" (wrongly spelt, by-the-way, "trantula"), without giving the slightest reason for such derivation, is to perplex rather than to enlighten those who desire to understand the assumed origin of this national dance. As we have already hinted, presuming that the author agrees with us, a careful revision of both these books would render them as complete as they deserve to be, for all the faults we have mentioned show rather haste than want of knowledge. Miss Gibson evinces such earnestness of purpose in following out the plan she has laid down that, although we have candidly criticised the result of her labours, we are certain that she will have the wisdom to rank us amongst the best friends to her cause.

The Philosophy of Voice. Showing the right and wrong action of voice in speech and song. To which is added, The Basis of Musical Expression. By Charles Lunn. Fourth edition, enlarged. [Baillière, Tindall and Cox.]

MR. LUNN appears now to address his remarks upon voice-production rather to the medical than to the musical profession, and he must not therefore be surprised if those whom he tacitly passes by as unworthy to be appealed to on the subject should look somewhat coldly upon his efforts. Presuming that the matter is really one to be considered by doctors, instead of by teachers of singing, the author of this treatise must be content to wait until, by surgical art, voices have been sufficiently trained to be ready for the vocal profession. Dr. Garrett and Mr. Lennox Browne have contributed important works on the production and proper management of the voice; and good may eventually result from the advice of so many able theorists; but meantime our concert-rooms must be supplied, and Mr. Lunn must know as well as ourselves that we have a few vocalists who shed a lustre upon their art, in spite of their not having commenced the culture of their voice under a surgeon. Seeing that the treatise before us has already reached a fourth edition, there can be little doubt as to the interest awakened on the subject upon which Mr. Lunn has so ably treated; yet we cannot but believe that, as we can hardly hope to make surgeons musicians, it will be necessary to make musicians surgeons before the theory can be successfully carried out; for the influence of a musical mind on the youngest student is all-powerful. We may say, in conclusion, that in this fourth edition we have some valuable remarks upon malformation or defective speech, and also upon the "vibrato," one of the worst vices of the modern school of vocalisation.

Stephen Heller: his Life and Works. From the French of H. Barbedette. By Robert Brown-Borthwick, Vicar of All Saints', Scarborough. [Ashdown and Parry.]

ONE of the great merits of this little book is that, although the artist of whom it treats is evidently a favourite of the author, there is no evidence of that hero-worship which makes so many works of this kind absolutely intolerable to the majority of the readers. In proof of this let us cite the following: "Like Chopin, Heller is a dreamer, a poet, 'a 'penseroso.' Like him, he has a horror of vulgarity; his 'form' is exquisite, his idea always noble. And yet Chopin has acquired a brilliant fame, which has not yet followed Stephen Heller." This is undoubtedly true; but we cannot agree with our author when he says the reason of this is that "Chopin came to France at a time when the enthusiasm of the French for Poland and the Poles was at its height," and that, as he fell upon the age of Romanticism, "a blighted love, a lost country, health so feeble that his life seemed but a breath" contributed to "touch the hearts of beautiful Duchesses, who prided themselves upon being called his pupils, and crowded around his pianoforte whenever he condescended to let his fingers roam over the keys." The fact is that Chopin was both an original thinker and an original player, and not only "beautiful Duchesses" crowded round his pianoforte whenever he could be persuaded to perform, but the most eminent artists of the time; and even now the magic of his style lives in the memory of all who had the privilege of hearing him, and his compositions, although widely known, have but few sympathetic interpreters. No comparison need be made between Stephen Heller and Chopin, for the works of the former composer can well afford to stand upon their own merits. The less said, perhaps, about his "originality" the better; but he has nevertheless earned a high place amongst the modern writers for the pianoforte, for the exquisite grace, refinement, and pure musicianship observable in his merest trifles endow them with a vitality which there is no need to fear will speedily diminish. Certainly his "Studies" (although so decidedly "pieces" that publishers have continually issued many of them with fantastic titles) are models of purity and elegance; and as exercises for variety of rhythm and phrasing they must always be highly prized by teachers. His "Promenades d'un solitaire," "Nuits blanches," and "Dans les bois" are already popular with all pianoforte-players who do not devote themselves to mere "show-pieces," and to these may be added his "Album dédié à la jeunesse," which, although intended for young performers, may be played through with enjoyment by the most advanced pianists. By the many lovers of the works of Stephen Heller the little book before us will be read with much pleasure, for not only does it trace his career with the minuteness and accuracy which may be expected from so warm an admirer, but many passing observations upon art and artists are extremely interesting.

Te Deum and Benedictus in D major, composed by Charles Edward Miller. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN our number for last July we noticed a Service in E major by Mr. Miller. This he has now followed by a second, a portion of which lies before us. The present work is a curious contrast to its predecessor. The Service in E we found for the most part excellent from a musical point of view, but somewhat too difficult for average parish choirs. In the Te Deum and Benedictus now under notice we find, on the other hand, only one point open to criticism as regards easiness of performance, and that is a somewhat free use of the high A in the treble part of the Benedictus: but the workmanship of both pieces is far from being equal to that of the earlier Service. We find three bad consecutive fifths between voice parts, and another in the organ accompaniment (on pages 4, 6, 7, and 10), besides various improperly resolved dissonances, and uncomfortable passages such as the following (p. 7) :—

Others hardly less objectionable might be quoted. Mr. Miller is not without ability, but he must study more thoroughly and write more carefully if he would do anything of real value.

Mass in D, for Four Voices and Organ. By Alessandro Cellini. [Dublin: Pigott and Co.]

Several months ago a copy of this Mass was sent to us for review. We examined it carefully, and, finding it impossible to say anything in its praise, adopted the course which we generally pursue in such cases, and passed it over. The publishers have now sent a second copy, with a special request for a notice; and, as they seem determined to find out what we think of it, we will tell them exactly—if they do not like it, they have only themselves to thank. We consider the Mass one of the most unsatisfactory compositions submitted to us for a long while past. It appears to be a mixture in about equal parts of the commonplace, secular, and vulgar; and we cannot find one single movement in the whole work which we can honestly praise. We wish that the publishers and composers would remember what has been often said in these columns, that, if no notice is taken of a work, it is not that it is overlooked, but that it is thought not worth reviewing.

Sixty Voluntaries, arranged for the Harmonium. By J. W. Elliott. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Elliott's name on the title-page of this collection of Voluntaries will be a sufficient guarantee for the excellence of their arrangement for what may be termed our household sacred instrument; but we must also call attention to the rich mine of wealth contained within so small a compass. Beethoven, Spohr, and Mendelssohn are amongst those most largely represented; but the names of nearly all the eminent composers of sacred music are included in the selections; and, as the extracts are chiefly from well-known works, they cannot fail to find universal acceptance.

Six Anthems for the great Church Festivals and other special occasions. Composed by J. Maude Crament. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In these six Anthems, from the pen of a writer whom we have not met before, we find evidence of much careful and thoughtful work. They are one and all well written, and tuneful, though of no very decided individuality of style. We learn from the dedication to the Crown Princess of Prussia that they have been composed expressly for the choir of the English Church, Berlin; and, if they are adequately rendered there, we should certainly infer that the church possesses an excellent choir. We do not mean to imply that any of the Anthems are of excessive difficulty, but they all require good singing. No. 1, in G major, "Prepare ye the way," is spirited and effective; the first movement pleases us the least, as there is a prevalence of dotted notes, which gives rather a jerky character to the music, but the concluding fugue is well written. The Christmas Anthem (No. 2), "Behold, I bring you good tidings," opens with a melodious treble Solo and Chorus, followed by a very unconventional, but by no means ineffective, setting of "Glory to God in the highest," with a florid organ accompaniment. No. 3, "Christ is risen from the dead," is to our mind the least interesting of the six, being more commonplace in character than any of the others. No. 4, on the contrary, "In my Father's house are many mansions" (in the rather unusual key, for choral music, of D flat), is our favourite of the whole series; melody, harmony, and treatment are alike good. No. 5, "Praise the Lord, ye servants" is also an excellent number, containing much pleasing writing; while we care somewhat less for No. 6, "Ho! every one that thirsteth." Taken as a whole, the collection may be fairly pronounced to be above, rather than below, the average of such publications.

Andante in A for the Organ. Composed by Samuel Sebastian Wesley. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The present piece is, we believe, one of the last compositions of the late Dr. Wesley. It is admirably written, and shows not merely an intimate acquaintance with the organ, on which, as our readers are aware, the composer was one of the greatest performers of the present generation, but a mastery over form such as but few writers of organ music possess. After carefully studying the movement, we cannot help thinking that Dr. Wesley wrote it as an intentional paraphrase of the Larghetto of Beethoven's Symphony in D. Not only are the key and the time ($\frac{3}{8}$) identical—this of course would be a very small matter—but there is a most striking similarity in the design of the two movements. Let any one compare pages 2 and 3 of this piece with the opening of Beethoven's Larghetto and he will see the resemblance at once. Or, again, take the second subject (p. 4, line 3); this seems obviously suggested by the thirty-third and following bars of Beethoven's. Similar coincidences can be traced, with more or less distinctness, through nearly all the movement; and we mention them not in disparagement, but because Dr. Wesley's Andante derives a special interest of its own from the circumstance. J. B. Cramer once published a Sonata entitled "La Parodie," which is an intentional copy of one by Dussek. We cannot help believing that here we have another "parody," and an exceedingly clever one. If the coincidence is purely accidental, it is one of the most curious in musical literature.

Postlude (Tempo di Minuetto) for Organ, by Francis Edward Gladstone (Augener and Co.), is a well-written organ piece, but scarcely equal in interest, we think, to some of Mr. Gladstone's other works. We must, however, specially commend the very neat little "Canon in the octave" which serves as Trio to the movement.

Popular Classics for the Pianoforte. Selected, edited, and fingered by Walter Macfarren. Fifth Series. [Ashdown and Parry.]

The fact of this excellent collection of classical works having reached a "fifth series" sufficiently proves that the demand for the higher class of pianoforte compositions is steadily on the increase. Of course, apart from careful editing and fingering, the heavy responsibility of selecting pieces suitable for general performance rests with the editor; and we congratulate the publishers upon having secured the services of one whose cultivated taste renders him so eminently fitted for the office. The twelve compositions comprising the new series are fully equal, both in variety and interest, to those which have preceded them. Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in D (No. 2, Op. 35) will be found an excellent study for this style of music; and the Gigue in B flat of Bach, the bright little "Tempo di Ballo," of Domenico Scarlatti, and the Variations in F minor of Haydn, should at once be in the hands of all classical students. The better-known "Marche Funèbre" and Valse in E flat of Chopin; the "Rondo Pastorale," from the Sonata in B flat (dedicated to Mrs. Chinnery), of Dussek; the Arabeske in C (Op. 18) of Schumann; the Variations on an original theme, in F, of Beethoven; the Polonaise in E flat and Polacca in E of Weber; and the Impromptu in B flat of Schubert, will also be warmly welcomed by all who desire music for the mind as well as the fingers. There are plenty more "Classics" which deserve to become "popular;" and, in the interest of true art, we shall be glad to see this series steadily progress.

FOREIGN NOTES.

The momentous political questions which during the greater part of last month have agitated all classes of French society alike, appear to have interfered but little with the musical activity of the capital. The "season" is now in full swing, and while operatic managers and concert-givers vie with each other to satisfy tastes which are perhaps in no other country more varied than in France, preparations are being actively carried on with a view to an adequate representation of the musical art during the forthcoming International Exhibition. A propos of the latter event a fresh difficulty has sprung up relative to the promised first representation on that occasion of M. Gounod's Opera "Polyeucte," the composer being probably impressed by the old maxim that a good thing is none the less prized for being with difficulty won. It appears that when M. Halanzier, the Director of the Paris Opera, applied to the composer for the score of the new work, so that the rehearsals might be proceeded with, he was informed that it had been sold for the sum of 100,000 francs to the publishing firm of Lemoine. The latter, being applied to in turn, naturally declined to part with the score in question except on payment of a stipulated sum of money. The matter will be brought before a court of law. Two new operatic works of but little importance have recently been produced at lyric establishments in Paris, viz. at the Bouffes-Parisiens, a comic Opera by a young composer hitherto unknown, M. Chabrier. The work is entitled "L'Etoile" and is very favourably spoken of by the press, its author being represented as a worthy follower in the footsteps of MM. Offenbach, Strauss, and Lecocq. The other novelty referred to is a work of greater pretensions, an opera seria, entitled "Zilia," which was brought out by the Théâtre-Italien on the first of last month. The libretto is from the pen of M. Solera (who has also furnished some of the textbooks to Verdi's Operas, notably that to "Nabuco"), and the composer is M. Gaspar Villate, a native of Cuba, who has made his début in the world with the present work. To judge, however, by the tone adopted in the French journals, M. Villate's "Zilia" is not likely to prove a great acquisition to operatic literature, being full of musical platitudes and reminiscences chiefly from works of the Italian school. It is not often the Théâtre-Italien produces a novelty, and the choice it made in this instance seems to have been an unfortunate one. Signor Tamberlik sustained one of the principal parts in the Opera mentioned. That celebrated tenor, whose engagement with the Italien has now expired, has left Paris for Madrid. By a new contract concluded with the Renaissance, M. Charles Lecocq has further bound himself to write exclusively for that establishment until the 1st of January, 1880. A reading of his new comic Opera "Le Petit Duc" took place at the Renaissance, when the work was pronounced by the artists present to contain all the elements of a great success. The principal rôle in it is reserved for Mdlle. Jeanne Granier.

A young Russian singer, Mdlle. Nordi, made her début last month at the Théâtre-Italien in the character of Gilda, in "Rigoletto," and met with a most encouraging reception. She is said to be an artist of exceptional talent and promise.

M. Adolphe Jullien, the able contributor to the Paris Revue et Gazette Musicale, has just published a volume bearing upon the history of French Opera, and entitled "La Cour et l'Opéra sous Louis XVI." Picchini, Sacchini, and Salieri are the composers chiefly treated of, whose influence upon their time, though ephemeral, was yet sufficiently marked, and the part they played sufficiently prominent to invest M. Jullien's work with a considerable amount of interest to the student of art-history.

An appeal is being addressed, on the part of the Commission of the Musical Department at the coming International Paris Exhibition, to all possessors of rare and curious musical instruments, scores, manuscripts, and other interesting relics bearing upon the art and emanating from any period previous to the present century. Proprietors of such objects are requested to aid, by the loan of them, the forming of a collection sufficiently complete to be studied with advantage by the musicophile. Communications on the subject should be addressed either to the Directeur-général de l'Exposition, or to M. Ambroise Thomas, president of the commission.

The sale of the Sax collection of musical instruments, &c. terminated on the 6th of last month, having occupied three days. The result fell far short of the expectations of the owners, the collection realising only some 12,000 francs, or one-fourth of the sum originally demanded.

Herr Anton Rubinstein, L'Art Musical informs us, left Paris in the early part of last month. The celebrated pianist and composer will return to the French capital, after a few months' absence, for the purpose of giving a series of concerts, and also to assist in the representation of his Opera "Nero." During part of the interval, Herr Rubinstein will undertake a concert tournée in Belgium and Holland. Since leaving Paris he has been giving concerts at Bruxelles, Berlin, and other continental towns; in short, there is no following the rapid and meteorlike course of the modern musical virtuoso.

As an instance of the general depression of the country, French journals mention the fact that the Opera House at Bordeaux had to be closed on the 1st ult. for want of support on the part of the public as well as of the Government, whose annual subvention had this year been reduced by 15,000 francs.

Under the name of "Société du Concert National," a Society is being formed at Bruxelles, whose object it will be to make known the works of Belgian composers.

Mdlle. Minnie Hauck has reappeared at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, at Bruxelles, having entered upon a new contract with the impresario of that establishment. She will shortly interpret the titular female characters in "Paul et Virginie" and "Romeo et Juliette."

There has been no novelty of particular interest in the répertoire of the leading operatic establishments in Germany during the past month, with the exception only of M. Saint-Saëns's "Delila," which was performed on the 2nd ult. at the Theatre at Weimar. A large concourse of musicians and amateurs had assembled from all parts to witness the first representation of an important work of the leading representative of "young France," of which fragments only have been heard within the limits of his native country. The performance, according to a correspondent of Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Zeitung was an excellent one, and although the opinions of connoisseurs differ very widely as to the merits of the work in detail, there appears to be but one voice as to its significance as a whole. The influence of Wagner's theories upon the composer is, of course, plainly discernible, but the work is nevertheless said to preserve throughout a distinct individuality of style. The subject of "Delila," we need hardly add, is taken from the Old Testament, and the dramatic version, from the pen of M. F. Lemaire, has been translated into German for the Weimar Theatre by Herr Richard Pohl.

The following are the principal works to be performed at the Festival of the Lower Rhine, to be held this year at Düsseldorf under the conductorship of Herr Anton Rubinstein: viz. Psalms by Handel, Symphony (C major) by Schubert, Faust-music by Schumann on the first day; on the second, Rubinstein's "Ocean Symphony" and Gluck's "Orpheus;" on the third day, Beethoven's Concerto in E flat major for pianoforte (to be played by Herr Rubinstein), a choral work by Tausch, and miscellaneous pieces.

As many as seven more or less distinguished pianists appeared in concerts in Berlin during one week of last month, viz. Mdlles. Wenzel, von Mühler, Anna Rilke; H. H. Zarebski, Olberich, and Rubinstein, and Madame Clara Schumann.

The inauguration of a new theatre and opera-house took place recently at Augsburg with Beethoven's "Fidelio," preceded by the Jubel Overture of C. M. von Weber and a prologue spoken by the author, Herr E. Possart.

Herr Paul Geisler, a young German composer of great talent, is just now engaged upon the composition of a music-drama, entitled "Frithjof," which is raising great expectations in Leipzig musical circles.

The directors of the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig contemplate the erection of a new concert-hall, in addition to the time-honoured locality from which they derive their name, and which is, in future, to be reserved for the performance of chamber-music only. The projected new building is to hold at least 2,000 persons, and the directors rely upon public support for the effectual carrying out of their scheme.

It appears that the valuable library of the late Julius Rietz has not, as announced by the German press, been acquired by the town of Dresden, and that a catalogue of the collection will shortly be published for the purpose of putting it up at auction.

According to a statement contained in German journals, Herr Max Bruch has been invited to write a choral and orchestral work for the Birmingham Festival to be held in 1879.

At the Lobe-Theater at Breslau a lecture on the Telephone is just now being delivered after every performance, ramifications in connection with the instrument being distributed all over the building for the use of the audience.

Among the papers of the late Viennese Kapellmeister Herbeck, four manuscript Symphonies have been discovered, one of which will shortly be performed by the Philharmonic Society of Vienna. Herbeck was also the possessor of a number of as yet unpublished compositions by Franz Schubert.

As a New Year's gift, the eminent publishing firm of B. Schott's Söhne, of Mayence, have just issued the first edition of "Parsifal; ein Bühnenweihfestspiel von Richard Wagner," being the poetry (otherwise libretto) to the new music-drama, upon the composition of which the Bayreuth reformer is at present engaged. While on this head, we may call the attention of our readers to some interesting and thoughtful articles, from the pen of Herr Hans von Wolzogen, contained in recent numbers of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, and inscribed "Nibelungen-Drama und Christenthum."

Mdlle. Etelka Gerster's interpretations at the Imperial Opera of St. Petersburg, have been a series of triumphs for the gifted singer. During a performance of "Lucia," the audience were so persevering in their applause that the diva was forced to sing the whole of the mad scene over again.

The coming season of Opera at the Theatre La Scala of Milan bids fair to become a very brilliant one. Madame Adelina Patti and Signor Nicolini have been definitely engaged, and among the Operas to be performed are mentioned "L'Africaine," "Cinq-Mars," and "Aïda." The latter work is to be conducted on its first representation by the composer himself.

The historic series of operatic performances at present being held at the Court Theatre of Cassel (of which mention has already been made in these columns) continue to attract general attention among music-lovers in Germany.

We subjoin the programmes of concerts which have taken place during the past month at some of the leading institutions abroad.

Paris.—First Concert of the Conservatoire (Dec. 2): Symphony, B flat (Beethoven); portions from "Elijah" (Mendelssohn); fragments from the ballet in "Iphigénie en Aulide" (Gluck); Motett (Palestrina); Symphony in C (Haydn).—Seventh Concert Populaire (Dec. 2): Symphony, "Eroica" (Beethoven); Saltarelle (Gounod); Quintett for pianoforte and stringed instruments (Schumann); Fragment from "Orpheus" (Gluck); Overture, "Patrie" (Bizet).—Eighth Concert Populaire (Dec. 9): Romeo et Juliette (Berlioz); Adagio from the Septett (Beethoven); Concerto for violoncello (Ed. Lalo); Symphony, C major, No. 3 (Haydn).—Sixth Concert du Châtelet (Dec. 9): "Le Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz).—Third Concert of the Conservatoire (Dec. 16): Choral Symphony (Mendelssohn); Concerto, C major, for pianoforte (Beethoven); Overture to "Euryanthe" (Weber).—First Concert Populaire, second series (Dec. 16): Symphony in A (Beethoven); Quintett for pianoforte and stringed instruments (Schumann); Gavotte (Lulli); Scherzo from "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); Rhapsodie Hongroise (Liszt).

Leipzig.—Eighth Concert of the Gewandhaus (Dec. 6): Overture to "Fanisca" (Cherubini); Air from the "Creation" (Haydn); Concerto, F minor (Chopin); Symphony, C major (Schubert).—Conservatorium Concert (Dec. 5): Concerto for two pianofortes (Dussek); Sonata, E minor, for violin (Gade); Prelude and Fugue for two pianofortes (Riedel); Italian Concerto (Bach); Pianoforte Quintett (Schumann).—Conservatorium Concert (Dec. 7): Quartett, C major (Beethoven); Trio, G major (Beethoven); Pianoforte pieces (Rubinstein, Liszt, Schumann).—Fifth "Euterpe" Concert (Dec. 11): Overture to "Sardanapalus" (Remy); Serenade, F major (Volkmann); Symphony, "Eroica" (Beethoven).

Berlin.—Concert of the "Symphonie Kapelle" (Dec. 2): Symphony, "Jupiter" (Mozart); Symphony in B (Beethoven); Overtures to "Melusine," "Abenceragen," and "Tannhäuser;" Polonaise (Vieuxtemps).—Concert of the "Stern'che Verein" (Dec 17): Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis."

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In that portion of the article on "Borrowed Plumes" (Musical Times, December, p. 587) which refers to Day's editions of Sternhold's Psalms, and to Archbishop Parker's Psalter, there are one or two inaccuracies, which I may perhaps be allowed to point out and correct. The writer of the article quotes Engel as saying, "The first edition of metrical psalms with musical notation for the Church of England, by Sternhold and Hopkins, London, 1562, has merely the melodies without any harmonious accompaniment, not even a bass," upon which he remarks, "The truth is John Day printed the Psalms in 1562, harmonised for four voices, but each part in a separate book, the melody being of course the tenor part." And again, "Two years previously, in 1560, Day had published Parker's Psalter with the tunes harmonised by Tallis," &c. Now neither is Engel's statement, nor are the amendments of his corrector, accurate. The dates of these early musical psalters are seldom rightly quoted; and as I know of no work in which a complete and reliable list may be found, I will give, for the benefit of your antiquarian readers, such information as I have been able to collect respecting them.

The first edition of the metrical psalms with musical notes was not, as Engel says, by Sternhold and Hopkins, but by Miles Coverdale, the translator of the Bible, whose "Goostly Psalmes and Spirituall Songes drawen out of the holy Scripture for the comforte and consolacyon of soch as love to rejoyse in God and his worde" were printed, with notes, by John Gough. There is no date to the book, and it may have gone through more than one edition; but as Coverdale's "Goostly Psalmes," &c. was prohibited by Henry VIII. in 1539, and Gough does not appear to have printed after 1545, the early date of its publication is unquestionable. [Queen's College, Oxford.]

In 1549 Robert Crowley published "The Psalter of David newely translated into Englyshe metre, in such sort that it may the more decently and wyth more delyte of the mynde be reade and songe of al men. Whereunto is added a note of four partes, wyth other thynges as shall appeare in the Epistle to the Readar. Translated and Imprinted by Robert Crowley in the yere of our Lorde 1549, the xx daye of September. And are to be solde in Eley rentes in Holburne." [B.N. College, Oxford.]

In 1553 was published "Certaine Psalmes select out of the Psalter of David, and drawen into Englyshe Metre, wyth Notes to every Psalme in IV Parts to Synge, by F. S. [Francis Seagar]. Imprint. by wyllyam Seres at the sygne of the Hedge Hogge. 1553." [Heber's Catalogue.]

In 1556 appeared, but not in England, the first edition of Sternhold's Psalms with music. It was published abroad, with this title: "Fifty one Psalmes in metre; whereof xxxvij were made by T. Sternholde, and the rest by others: conferred with the Hebrewe and corrected &c. with musical notes; Geneva, printed by J. Crespin." [Bodleian Library.] There was a second edition in 1569. In 1561 another "Psalmes in metre, with notes" was published at Geneva by Zacharie Durand, but I cannot give any further title. [St. Paul's Library.]

1558-9. Between July 1558 and July 1559 Wiliam Seres had a license from the Stationers' Company to print "The Psalmes in mytre, noted." [Johnson, Typ. i. 544.]

It is uncertain if John Day published an edition of the Psalms with notes in 1560. I have seen a single part, "Bassus," of that date, quoted as a psalter, and I believe it is in the British Museum, but it may belong to the "Service" which he printed in the same year with the following title: "Certaine notes set forth in foure and three partes to be Song at the Morning Communion and Evening praier very necessarie for the Church of Christ to be frequented and used: and unto them be added divers Godly Praiers and Psalmes in the like forme to the honour and praise of God. Imprinted at London over Aldersgate beneath St. Martins by John Day. 1560." The psalms here alluded to are set as anthems. Editions of Day's Psalter with notes, of which there is no doubt, are the following:—

1561. "Hondert Psalmen Davids. I. Utenhove. London. Jan Daye. 1561." 8vo. A Dutch version of a hundred psalms, with notes, printed for the use of foreign Protestant refugees. In this volume is the earliest known appearance of the "Old Hundredth" tune. [British Museum.] (In Steeven's Catalogue I find the following: "Sternholde, Tho. Fourescore and Seven Psalmes of David with the Musick, the Songe of Simeon, the Ten Commandments and the Lord's Prayer." Black letter, 24mo, 1561.)

1562. "The whole Booke of Psalmes collected into Englishe metre by T. Sternholde, J. Hopkins and others, conferred with the Ebrue with apte notes to sing them withal."

1563. "The whole Psalmes in foure partes [Tenor, Contra-Tenor, Medius, and Bassus] whiche may be song to al musicall instrumentes, set forth for the encrease of vertue and abolishyng of other vayne and triflyng ballades. Imprinted at London by John Day dwelling over Aldersgate, beneath Saynt Martyns." 4to. [A complete set in B.N. College, Oxford.]

1564. "The firste parte of the Psalmes collected into English Meter by Thomas Sternholde and others conferred with the Ebrue with apt notes to sing them withal." 12mo. [Heber's Catalogue.]

1565. "The whole Psalmes in foure partes," &c. This edition, of which the title-page is the same as that of 1563, is also, like that edition, printed in four separate volumes. [British Museum.]

In this year Day also printed a second collection of music for the Church services, similar to that of 1560.

1567. "The whole Booke of Psalmes collected into Englishe meter by Thomas Sternhold, John Hopkins and others, conferred with the Hebrue, with apt Notes to sing them withall, With the Lorde's Prayer, Crede &c. Imprinted by John Daye 1567." [Heber's Catalogue.]

Other editions of Sternhold's Psalms with notes were published by Day in 1569, 1570, 1577, 1579, 1580, and in 1582; his last edition was that of 1584, "The whole Booke of Psalmes collected into Englishe metre by Sternhold Whittingham Hopkins and others. With notes. John Daye, 1584." [Heber's Catalogue.] He died in this year, but his tunes, more or less altered, continued to be reprinted up to 1629 (Buck, Cambridge), the last edition with which I am acquainted. Meanwhile new composers and editors had taken the work in hand. William Daman's Psalms in four parts, 1579, and again a second set in 1590; John Cosyn's Sixty Psalms in six and five parts, 1585; Thomas Est's Psalms in four parts, by nine sundry authors, 1592; John Mundy's Psalms in three, four, and five parts, 1594; Richard Allison's in 1599; Andrew Hart's in 1615;* Robert Tailour's in the same year; and, above all, Thomas Ravenscroft's in 1621, had laid the foundation of our standard system of Old English Psalmody. It would have been interesting to give at full length the titles of the above-mentioned publications, and of other similar ones which succeeded them, but I fear to trespass too much upon your columns.

Of Archbishop Parker's Psalter all that can be said with certainty is that it was finished in 1557. Various dates from that year downwards have been assigned to its publication, either conjectural, or else erroneous quotations from some of the above-mentioned editions of Day. Dr. Farmer, whose accuracy as an antiquary is most reliable, has named 1567 as the year in which it was printed. In his own copy, which at the sale of his library in 1798 was bought for three pounds six shillings, and is now in the British Museum, he has supplied the title in manuscript: "The whole Psalter translated into English metre, which containeth an hundred and fifty Psalmes. The first Quinquagene. Imprinted at London by John Daye. 1567." The volume is a small quarto of about 328 pages, printed in a fine black letter. All before B iiij is wanting. The eight tunes in the book were not only harmonised but composed by Tallis, who has added at the foot of each tune "Qd. Talys." His ninth tune, to the Archbishop's version of Veni, Creator, I believe to be the earliest English single common metre that we have. It is remarkable that, although the hymn "Come, Holy Ghost, eternal God" was inserted in the Prayer Book of 1549, and has retained its place in the Ordinal, yet no one of the annotators of the Prayer Book has mentioned Archbishop Parker as the author of it. It stood alone in the service until the revision of 1662, when the long metre version was added as an alternative.

Of Tallis himself I have an anecdote to relate, which I believe has never been made public before, but which, as my letter has run to some length, I will reserve until next month.

* Andrew Hart's publication, Edin. 1615, is usually considered the earliest Psalter with notes printed in Scotland; but it must give place to the following most rare book: "The Mindes Melodie, contayning certayne Psalmes of the Kinglie Prophete David, applyed to a new pleasant tune, verie comfortable to everie one that is rightlie acquainted therewith. Edinburgh. Printed be Robert Charteris. 1605."

ARCANGELO CORELLI.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In the quarto edition of Sir John Hawkins's "History of Music," vol. iv. p. 313, the following passage occurs:—

"Corelli died at Rome about six weeks after the publication of his Opera 'Sesta;' [that is to say, on the 18th day of January, 1713, and was buried in the church of the Rotunda, otherwise called the Pantheon, in the first chapel on the left hand of the entrance. Over the place of his interment is a sepulchral monument to his honour, with a marble bust thereon, erected at the expense of Philip William, Count Palatine of the Rhine, under the care and direction of Cardinal Ottoboni. The following is the inscription thereon:—

D. O. M.
ARCANGELO CORELLIO A FUSIGNANO
PHILIPPI WILLELMO COMITIS PALATINE RHENI,"

&c. &c. To this is appended the following note, viz. "It is commonly said here that the Jig in the fifth Sonate in the Opera 'Quinta' is engraven on Corelli's monument; but it is in the following sense only that this assertion is true. The bust represents him, as the print does, with a music-paper in his hand, on which are engraven certain musical notes, which, upon a near inspection, appear to be a few bars of that fine air." "The print" mentioned here is a mezzo-tinto from a picture of Corelli painted by Mr. Hugh Howard; and Sir John Hawkins says of it, "The bust on the monument of Corelli in the Rotunda at Rome does in every respect most exactly correspond with the mezzo-tinto print."

When in Rome a few winters ago, and during a visit there early this year, I sought in vain for the bust mentioned in the foregoing extracts. "The sepulchral monument" with "the inscription thereon" is, indeed, where Sir John states it to be. It is a slab let into the wall of the Pantheon, and exhibits nothing else; nor does there seem to be even a place where the bust could have stood. I made several inquiries amongst my friends and others about the bust, but no one seemed to have heard of the existence of such a thing. I searched the Museum in the Capitol, whither it was said that the bust had been removed, but I found no trace of it. The Curator of the Museum told me that no such existed, and he added that it could not be there without his knowledge. There is, indeed, a bust of the composer in the Capitol, amongst those of other celebrities; but it seems to be a modern production, designed in the same fashion as those around, and presenting nothing peculiar.

Unwilling to give up my search, I had the above extracts from Sir John Hawkins translated into Italian, and shown about to the litterati in Rome, but without effect; and I even visited some of the musical societies, but could gain no information upon the subject.

The question now is, "Has the bust (if it ever existed) been destroyed; or if not, where is it?"

Perhaps some of your readers may be able to throw light upon a matter which to musicians is certainly very interesting.—Yours, faithfully, INQUIRER.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BANBURY.—On Wednesday the 5th ult. a selection of music was given at the close of the evening service, in the Parish Church. The programme was selected from the works of Schumann, Haydn, Ouseley, Mendelssohn, Spohr, G. A. Hardacre, and J. S. Bach. The organ solos were well rendered by Mr. Hardacre. Mr. Allen, Mr. Walkley, and Mr. Parkinson were the solo vocalists. A collection was made in aid of the Church Restoration Fund.

BEXLEY HEATH.—A Concert was given in the Town Hall on the 30th ult., in aid of the National Orphan Home. The artists engaged were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Cummings, Mr. Leigh Faulkner, and Mr. Gordon Gooch (vocalists), and Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant (solo violin).

BIRKENHEAD.—Handel's Messiah was given on Wednesday the 12th ult. in the Queen's Hall, under the auspices of the Cambrian Choral Society. The orchestra was scarcely equal to the performance of a work of such importance, but the vocal solos were well rendered, Mrs. Billinie Porter, Miss Marie Ternan, and Mr. H. T. Bywater acquitting themselves throughout with much success. Mr. William Parry conducted with much ability.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Festival Choral Society gave a miscellaneous Concert at the Town Hall, on Thursday, November 29, assisted by Madame Sinico, Mdlle. Redeker, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Signor Campobello. The choral pieces were the most interesting items in the performance, and included Mendelssohn's 43rd Psalm, Crotch's Motett, "Methinks I hear," Macfarren's "The sands of Dee," and Leslie's "Resurgam." Of the soloists Mdlle. Redeker and Mr. Lloyd made the greatest impression, Mr. Stimpson gave two organ solos, Mr. R. M. Winn was an efficient accompanist, and Mr. Stockley conducted with his usual skill.——The second of Mr. Hayward's Chamber Concerts took place on the 4th ult. The artists were the same as at the first concert with the exception of the pianist, who on this occasion was Miss Welchman. A capital programme was well performed, and the attendance was better than at the previous concert.——The Carl Rosa Opera Company closed their successful visit on the 1st ult. With the exception of Robin Hood, the last week was given up to repetitions. A feature of local interest was the appearance of Miss Emma Beasley as Arline in The Bohemian Girl, which character, considering her short experience on the stage, she sustained very creditably.——Messrs. Harrison's second Subscription Concert was given in the Town Hall on Thursday the 5th ult. The great attractions were the fine orchestra of Mr. Charles Hallé, and the eminent violinist Madame Norman-Néruda. The novelty presented was Goldmark's so-called Symphony, "A Rustic Wedding." The work was splendidly played, and, in spite of its length, pleased the audience. Madame Néruda played part of a Concerto by Vieuxtemps, and Beethoven's "Romance in F," with her accustomed success, and Mr. Charles Hallé gave an excellent rendering of Chopin's Andante and Polonaise, Op. 22, with orchestral accompaniment. The vocalists were Madame Trebelli-Bettini and Herr Behrens, whose efforts were most successful. The attendance was enormous, and the concert a success in every way.——The Birmingham Schools' Choral Union held its Eighth Festival, in aid of the Children's Hospital, on the 6th ult. A selection of Part-songs was admirably performed by a chorus of 1000 voices, under the direction of Mr. G. J. Rankilor, the finest effect being produced in Pierson's "Ye mariners of England." Mr. Stimpson played several solos on the organ, and Mr. James Mathews on the flute; there were also several vocal soloists. The attendance was very good.

BRIGHTON.—The Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society terminated a most successful season with a performance of Handel's Oratorio, the Messiah, on the 4th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Adela Vernon, Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The orchestra included several well-known artists. Mr. J. Spearing presided at the organ, and Mr. R. Taylor conducted. The Choruses were excellently rendered, being marked by breadth and massiveness, as well as delicacy of expression. Miss Adela Vernon was very successful in "Rejoice greatly" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke gave "He shall feed His flock" and "He was despised" in a very effective manner. Mr. A. Kenningham, one of the lay-vicars of St. Paul's Cathedral, sang with pure and unaffected pathos, and Mr. Thurley Beale rendered the bass solos in splendid style. Mr. J. Spearing played the organ accompaniments with skill, giving the majority of the recitatives from Mr. Best's arrangement for the organ.

BRISTOL.—On Thursday, the 29th of November, a performance of the Messiah was given in the Colston Hall. The principal vocalists were Miss Julia Wigan, Miss Florence Wydford, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Lawford Huxtable. The orchestral parts were played by a band, led by Mr. A. W. Waite. Mr. George Riseley presided at the organ, and Mr. S. Hatton conducted.——At the Monday Popular Concert given in the Colston Hall on the 3rd ult. the band played Rossini's Overture to La Cenerentola, Mendelssohn's "War March" from Athalie, the last movement of Haydn's "Farewell Symphony," and other pieces of the same class, in a very effective manner. Mr. J. L. Roeckel took the pianoforte part in Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor. Madame Löwe was the vocalist. At the concert on the 17th ult. Haydn's "Clock Symphony" and the Overture to Weber's Oberon were amongst the pieces splendidly played by the orchestra. Mr. Barrett performed two piccolo solos, and Mr. H. T. Bywater was the vocalist. Mr. George Riseley conducted at both concerts.——On Thursday the 13th ult. a Complimentary Concert was given by Mr. Greenwood's choir to their Conductor, "in recognition of his gratuitous and valuable services for a period exceeding seven years." The programme included Part-songs, &c., by Stevens, Smart, Reay, J. Greenwood, Randegger, Leslie, Hatton, and Bishop, Auber's "Market Chorus" from Masaniello, and Pierson's naval Chorus "Ye mariners of England," both the latter being given with organ accompaniment by Mr. George Riseley. Miss Jessie Royd, Mr. T. W. Hanson, and Mr. H. J. Dyer were the principal vocalists, and Mr. George Riseley contributed two solos on the grand organ. Mr. C. Greenwood was at the pianoforte, and Mr. J. Greenwood conducted. The choir consisted of 104 voices.

CHESHAM.—The members of the Choral Society gave their first Concert of the season on Monday evening, the 10th ult. The programme consisted of operatic selections, interspersed with popular songs and ballads. The choruses were exceedingly well rendered. The concerted music included the Quartett "Take care," carefully sung by Misses Barrett and Hyatt, Messrs. Birch and Barnes; "Lightly treading," sung by Miss Rose, Messrs. Herrik and Bates; and the Duet, "I would that my love," by Misses Stone and Birch. The solos were entrusted to Miss C. Rose, Miss Millicent Birch, Mr. J. G. Stone, jun. (the indefatigable Secretary), and Mr. Herrik. A grand pianoforte was kindly lent by Messrs. Brinsmead for the occasion.

CIRENCESTER.—The Choral Society gave an open night on Thursday the 20th ult. The works performed were Lauda Sion (Mendelssohn) and the Lay of the Bell (Romberg), with Sir R. P. Stewart's arrangement of the "Bells of St. Michael's Tower," and "Good night" (Carulli). Miss Gertrude Ferrabee, R.A.M., gave her assistance, and, considering the short time the Society has been working, the performance was most satisfactory to the members and its Conductor, Mr. Brind. Mr. Newton, Organist of Highnam Church, presided with much ability at the harmonium, and Miss Fisher at the pianoforte.

CLIFTON.—On the 4th ult. another of Mr. J. C. Daniel's series of Winter Entertainments was given at the Victoria Rooms, consisting of a Pianoforte Recital by Madame Arabella Goddard, who played Sir W. S. Bennett's Sonata the "Maid of Orleans" and a selection of classical and popular pianoforte pieces. Miss Amy Aylward, R.A.M., was the vocalist.——On the 13th and 14th ult., Mr. Daniel introduced the Organist of the Alexandra Palace, London, Mr. Frederic Archer, who gave three Organ Recitals at the Victoria Rooms, which were highly successful. Madame Ernst and Mr. Bernard Lane were the vocalists.——On Wednesday the 12th ult. Mrs. Viner Pomeroy gave her second Classical Chamber Concert at the Victoria Rooms. The executants were Herr Ludwig Straus (first violin), Mr. E. Woodward (second violin), Mr. J. B. Zerbini (viola), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violoncello) and Mrs. Viner Pomeroy (pianoforte). The programme included Mozart's Quartett in G, No. 1; Spohr's Quintett, Op. 130; Tartini's "Devil's Sonata;" finely played by Herr Straus; and Mendelssohn's Quartett in E, Op. 12.——The fourteenth Annual Concert of the College Choral Society took place at the College on the 20th ult. For the first time a small orchestra, consisting of pupils of the College, under Mr. Andrew Waite, performed selections and also accompanied the choral numbers. The Choruses "Let their celestial concerts," "To dust his glory," "Tyrants now no more shall dread," "Trumpet shall be heard," were very well rendered. The "Vintage Chorus" from Mendelssohn's Loreley proved very attractive. Mr. W. F. Trimnell, the choirmaster, conducted.

CORK.—The opening Musical Soirée of the Cork Church of Ireland Young Men's Association took place on November 27 at the Assembly Rooms, under the direction of Dr. Marks, Organist of the Cathedral. The choir consisted of over one hundred voices, selected from the Cathedral and other church choirs, and their rendering of works by Handel, Mendelssohn, Haydn, &c. was excellent. Solos were contributed by Messrs. Keating, Griffin, Scott, Slorach, &c.——The first Concert of the Cork Orchestral Union for the present season took place at the Assembly Rooms, South Wall, on Wednesday evening, the 5th ult. This Society, which is now under the presidency of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, is doing a great deal towards the development of a taste for high-class music in the south of Ireland. The orchestra consists of nearly fifty executants, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Ringrose Atkins, and the performance of the Overtures to the Occasional Oratorio (Handel) and Zanetta (Auber), a selection from Wagner's Lohengrin, and Haydn's "Symphony in D"

(No. 2) was highly creditable. Two pianoforte solos were played by Miss Maud Murphy with power and brilliancy. Some vocal pieces were given by Mrs. Hall, Mrs. Lyons, Miss Agnes Power, Mr. W. Harvey, Mr. G. Waters, and Mr. P. St. John Murphy; and Mr. J. Waters rendered good service in the pianoforte accompaniments to the songs. Mr. Atkins conducted with care and judgment, EDINBURGH.—Sir Herbert Oakeley gave the first of his Organ Recitals in the Music Class Room, Park Place, on the 6th ult., when there was a very large attendance. The Recital was much enjoyed, the students expressing their enthusiasm and desire to hear every piece twice over. The programme was selected from the works of Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Rameau, and Sir G. Elvey.

FALMOUTH.—A very good Concert was given at the Polytechnic Hall, on the 13th ult., in aid of the St. Gluvias organ-fund. A great feature of the programme was the singing of some well-selected part-songs, under the direction of Mr. C. W. Robinson (the Organist and Choirmaster to Falmouth Parish Church), several of which were encored. The performance was generally excellent throughout the evening, a pianoforte solo by Master Ashton being especially admired.

FINCHLEY.—The members of the Choral Society gave the first concert of their second season at the Schoolroom, Ballard Lane, on Monday the 3rd ult. The programme comprised Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, and Hear my Prayer, and Van Bree's St. Cecilia's Day.—The solos were rendered by Miss Kate Shaboe, R.A.M., whose refined taste and pure articulation were well displayed in the air, "Oh, for the wings of a dove," and also in the florid passages in St. Cecilia's Day. The choruses were well sustained by a choir of about sixty voices, supported by a small but efficient orchestra, the whole reflecting great credit on the able Conductor, Mr. G. R. Fletcher.

GLASGOW.—The organ in St. Silas' English Episcopal Church was reopened on Sunday, the 9th ult., after having been entirely rebuilt by Messrs. Conacher and Co. of Huddersfield. The prayers were read by the Rev. E. F. D. Hutton, D.D., incumbent of the church, and the sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Bishop Beckles, D.D. The Pastoral Symphony from the Messiah was played by the Organist of the church, Mr. Montague Smith, as an opening voluntary. The hymn "Onward, upward, homeward" was sung to Dr. Sullivan's processional tune from the "Hymnary;" the Psalms were chanted to Chard in A, Spohr in F, and Leslie in C minor, and the Cantate and Deus were sung to Bridgewater's Service in A. The Anthem was the Quartett and Chorus, "Lord God of heaven and earth," from Spohr's Last Judgment. Before the sermon the hymn "O God of Bethel" was sung to Arnold's fine old tune; and while the collection was being made another Anthem was given, "The heavens are telling," from Haydn's Creation; after which the hymn "Glory to God on high" was sung to the National Anthem. The closing voluntary was Mendelssohn's "War March of the Priests."

GLOUCESTER.—On the 10th ult. about thirty members of the Gloucester Festival Class waited upon Mr. C. Harford Lloyd (Organist of the Cathedral) at his residence in Palace Yard, and presented him with a handsome clock as a testimonial. The presentation was made by Mr. William Higgs, who said he had been desired by the members of the Festival Class forming the Gloucester contingent of the choir at the recent Triennial Festival to ask Mr. Lloyd's acceptance of an expression of their respect and gratitude. They wished to acknowledge the advantage they had derived from his earnest and exceptional efforts to make the class as nearly perfect as possible. They had new and elaborate music to sing, but Mr. Lloyd had so repeatedly rehearsed it, and so clearly and kindly corrected every apparent mistake, giving his assistance in every difficulty, that the choruses of the late Festival were an unbroken success. Mr. W. Washbourn then read the address as follows: "To Charles Harford Lloyd, Esq., M.A., Mus. Bac., Organist of Gloucester Cathedral. The members of the Gloucester Festival Class desire to express their very high appreciation of your endeavours to improve them in the execution of the works undertaken during the past season, and their sincere thanks for your personal kindness and courtesy. They hope that the advantage and gratification arising from the meetings of the first season under your conductorship may be the happy augury of many more, wherein increased efficiency on the part of the members may lighten your labours and prove a source of mutual satisfaction and pleasure." Here follow fifty-six signatures of members' names. Mr. Lloyd said he was very much gratified at the kind assurance that his efforts had been so cordially accepted by the members of the choir, and he would in return assure them that, by the ready and careful attention they had given to the practices and to his suggestions during their rehearsals, they had inspired him with great confidence that they would perform their parts with success. It was pleasant to know that musical critics who were present had emphatically praised the Gloucester chorus. The testimonial would have a very conspicuous place in his residence, and prompt a very earnest wish for their future mutual success. The inscription on the clock was as follows: "Presented to C. H. Lloyd, Esq., Mus. Bac., by the members of the Gloucester Musical Festival Class. October 30, 1877."

GREENOCK.—Mr. Poulter's choir, consisting of about twenty-eight voices, gave a Concert in the Watt Institution, on Monday evening, the 10th ult. The programme consisted of unaccompanied glees, madrigals, and part-songs, the rendering of which showed that the choir had been well trained. The solos (by members of the choir) were of considerable merit.

HALIFAX.—On Tuesday the 4th ult. an instructive and interesting lecture on "The History of Modern Music" was given at the Crossley Orphanage by Dr. Roberts, Organist of the Parish Church. The musical illustrations were exceedingly well rendered by the Parish Church Choir and Mr. Verney Binns. There was a large and appreciative audience.

HARROGATE.—On Monday evening, the 10th ult., the newly erected organ in the Wesleyan Chapel was opened by Dr. Spark, Organist of the Leeds Town Hall. There was a very large attendance, and Dr. Spark exhibited the qualities of the instrument, built by Foster and Andrews, of Hull, to the greatest advantage.

HEREFORD.—The Herefordshire Philharmonic Society, which has just terminated its fifteenth season, appears to be rapidly growing in importance. Mr. Henry Leslie has been Conductor from the commencement, and the concerts, which take place in November and at Easter, are invariably well attended. At all performances the choir generally consists of between eighty and ninety vocalists, and the band of about forty-five instrumentalists. At the concert in November last Mozart's Symphony in E flat, Mendelssohn's Psalm, "As the hart pants," and several vocal pieces of interest were included in the programme.

HOUNSLOW.—A Concert was given at the Town Hall on the 11th ult. in aid of the fund for a new organ for St. Stephen's Church. The choir sang several choruses; and solos were contributed by Madame Coates, Miss Mills, Mr. Carter, and Mr. E. J. Bell. Great credit is due to Mr. Ruddock, the Choirmaster, and to Mr. Whale, the Organist, for the manner in which the choir has been trained.

KEIGHLEY.—A vocal contest took place at the Mechanics' Hall on the 15th ult. The singing was of a high order of merit, and duly appreciated by a large audience. The programme included some of the old Glees and Quartetts, by Webbe, Bishop, Horsley, &c., and Songs by Blumenthal, Sullivan, Hatton, Hobbs, Pinsuti, &c. Prizes were obtained by the following for Glees and Quartetts: Leeds Arion Glee Society, first prize; Calverley Orpheus, first prize; Calverley Orpheus, second prize; West Yorkshire (Leeds), second prize. The following soloists gained prizes: Mr. D. Sutton Shepley, Halifax (first); Mr. Singleton, Bradford (second); Mr. H. Wilson, Bradford (first); Mr. T. Oldroyd, Queensbury (second). The prizes amounted to twenty-five guineas. Mr. Loaring, F.C.O., of Bradford, acted as judge, and Mr. Eckersley, of the St. George's Hall Concerts, played the accompaniments.

LEAMINGTON.—On November 28th the Warwickshire Amateur Musical Society gave a good performance of a selection from Handel's Oratorio Hercules at the Public Hall. Mr. Frank Spinney conducted, and the solos were taken by amateurs, assisted by Signor Ghilberti and Mr. C. Videon Harding.——Mr. Frank Spinney gave the first of a series of subscription Pianoforte Recitals at his residence on Wednesday the 12th ult. Mr. Henry Taylor was the vocalist. Mr. Spinney played, amongst other pieces, Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Sonata in E.

LEEDS.—Recitals upon Messrs. Pohlmann and Son's new Pianofortes have recently been given at the Philosophical Hall with much success. The local papers are warm in praise of these instruments, which they say are made upon the "overstrung" principle, which enables a tone to be produced almost equal to that of the best horizontal grand pianos.

LIVERPOOL.—The twelfth of Mr. Jude's Harmonium, Pianoforte, and Vocal Recitals was given at Hope Hall on the 8th ult., and attracted, as usual, a large and appreciative audience. The programme was well selected; amongst the vocalists who achieved a success were Miss Laura Haworth and Miss Ensor. Several songs were encored, and the concert gave much satisfaction.

LLANELLY.—On the 18th ult. a large audience assembled at the Athenæum Hall to hear, for the first time in Wales, Handel's Oratorio, Saul, which was given by the Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. T. Rees. The principal vocalists were Misses Griffiths, Clement, Morris, and Martha Harries; Messrs. Videon Harding, Gordon Gooch, and D. Harries, all of whom were highly effective in the exacting music allotted to them. The choir and orchestra were thoroughly efficient, and throughout the work gave ample evidence of the care which had been bestowed upon its preparation. Miss Clement presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Radcliffe at the organ.

MADELEY, SALOP.—The Choral Society gave a concert on the 18th ult., when a selection from Judas Maccabæus and Locke's music to Macbeth were performed. The solos and duets were taken by members of the Society, "Sound an alarm" being finely sung by Mr. W. Anstice. The accompaniments throughout were played by Miss Anstice and Miss L. Anstice on the pianoforte and Mustel organ. Mr. Smart conducted.

MAIDENHEAD.—The Philharmonic Society gave a performance of Handel's Samson on the 13th ult. Miss Jessie Royd, Miss L. Hann, Mr. Mellor, and Mr. Christian were the principal vocalists. Mr. Rosenthal was leader, and Herr Max Schultz, conductor. The concert was a very successful one.

MOUTON.—The Choral Society gave its first Concert of the season at the Schoolroom on Tuesday evening, the 18th ult. The programme included three organ solos by the Conductor, Mr. R. F. Coules, F.C.O., of Worsley. The glees and part-songs were sung with great taste and expression. The principal vocalists were Miss Harrison, Miss Leigh, Mr. Jales, and Mr. Cunliffe. Mr. W. H. Ellwood accompanied the choruses, and Mr. Coules conducted and accompanied the songs, &c.

NEWPORT, SALOP.—On Wednesday evening, the 19th ult., the members of the Choral Society gave their first concert of the season. The first part consisted of selections from Handel's Oratorios. The band, led by Mr. Goddard, played the "March of the Israelites" (Costa), Gounod's "Marche Romaine," and the accompaniments to Locke's Macbeth music, which was given in the second part of the concert. Mr. Smart, Organist of the parish church, conducted.

NORWICH.—Nothing could have been more gratifying to Dr. Bunnett than the hearty reception accorded to him on the occasion of his Complimentary Concert on the 28th November. St. Andrew's Hall was literally thronged with people, and the audience comprised most of the influential families in the city and county. The appearance of Dr. Bunnett upon the platform was the signal for rounds and rounds of applause, and even cheers, and it was several minutes before the Doctor was allowed to take his place as Conductor of the opening Overture. The solo vocalists comprised Miss Blanche Lucas (soprano) and Miss Annie Butterworth (contralto), Mr. James Sauvage, Gold Medallist of the Royal Academy of Music, and Mr. Henry J. Minns (tenori), and Mr. Gordon Gooch, also of the Royal Academy of Music, and Mr. W. N. Smith (bassi). The instrumentalists were Mr. A. J. Oury (violin), Mr. Kingston Rudd, Mr. A. E. Bunnett, Dr. Bunnett, and Sir Julius Benedict (who came from London expressly to play on the occasion) as pianist. The programme was excellent, a great feature being the performance of the Pianoforte Duet, "Hommage à Handel," by Dr. Bunnett and Sir Julius Benedict, the bénéficiaire taking the first. All the vocalists were highly successful in their solos, and Dr. Bunnett's Part-song "Beware!" was encored. The net proceeds of the concert, amounting to £130, were presented on the 20th ult., at a luncheon given by the Mayor (J. D. Smith, Esq.) at the Council Chamber, Guildhall. In presenting the testimonial, the mayor alluded to the sympathy so universally felt at the non-appointment of Dr. Bunnett as Cathedral Organist, on the resignation of Dr. Buck; and, after expressing his thanks for the kindness of his fellow-citizens, Dr. Bunnett read the correspondence which had taken place on the subject between the Dean and himself, concluding with saying that he felt it his duty to make all the facts of the case distinctly known.

OAMARU, NEW ZEALAND.—On Tuesday evening, October 16, a concert consisting exclusively of classical compositions was given at the Masonic Hall by Mrs. Medland Newsham, with a success which sufficiently proves how rapidly the taste for high-class music is spreading in the Colony. The concert-giver's pianoforte solos—especially Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata"—were received with warm and deserved applause; and the performance of all the pieces, vocal and instrumental, included in the well-arranged programme, reflected the utmost credit upon the executants. The concert concluded with the National Anthem.

OXFORD.—A Concert was given on November 28, by the Oxford Choral Society, the works chosen being the Hymn of Praise and Stabat Mater. The band was largely augmented from the Royal Italian Opera, with Mr. Burnett as leader, and specially distinguished itself in the Symphony to the first-named work. The Choruses were very finely rendered, crispness and clearness of tone being especially noticeable, showing evidence of the most careful training by Mr. Allchin. The soloists were Miss Adela Vernon, Miss Bertha Griffiths, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Adolphus Phillips, all of whom were very successful. Mr. W. T. Howell Allchin, Mus. Bac., acted as conductor. ——The new organ, recently erected by Messrs. Willis, of London, in the Sheldonian Theatre, and which has a very elegant appearance, was formally opened on November 29, when the Professor of Music, the Rev. Sir F. Gore Ouseley, delivered a lecture to a large audience upon "The History and Construction of the Organ." His remarks, he said, had a twofold object, namely, to explain the history and construction of a certain large engine of musical sound called an organ, and to serve as the musical inauguration of a new and effective instrument which had recently been erected within those walls. In referring to the progress made in the construction of organs, he said that one at Magdeburg possessed the first keyboard on record. The keys, however, were not like the modern ones, but were an ell long and three inches broad, and some existed the record of which stated that they were five and a half inches in width. These keys had to be struck with the fist—hence the term "organ-thumpers." Until very recently England was far behind the rest of Europe in organ-building, but now we had shot ahead of all competitors in the art. One of their earliest builders was William Dean of Oxford, who lived in the early part of the fifteenth century. Nearly every organ in England was destroyed by the mistaken zeal of the Puritans in the time of Oliver Cromwell. There was never a time when English organ-building stood as high as at present. Alluding to the new organ, he said—so they all knew too well—the present instrument had a predecessor, and that predecessor was now defunct, and it deserved some sort of funeral oration at his hands. For many years, he, as well as many others, believed that Handel himself had opened the old organ, but further investigation had proved conclusively that this was not the case, Handel having died in 1759, and the organ whose loss they had now met to deplore was not opened till 1768, John Byfield, jun., being the builder. It seemed to him that the old instrument, on the whole, was to be condemned as inadequate in every respect. For more than thirty years he had desired to see this "old box of whistles" superseded by an instrument worthy of this University; since he had been Professor of Music this desire had gradually increased, and at last the great object had been accomplished, and by the surpassing skill of Mr. Willis they had now an organ that might rank among the finest in the kingdom. Mr. Parratt then played very finely Bach's St. Anne's Fugue, Mendelssohn's Sixth Sonata, and a Sonata composed for the occasion by the Professor. The tone of the organ shows good voicing, but it is somewhat lacking in diapason strength.——Two exercises for the degree of Mus. Doc. were performed in the Sheldonian Theatre before a crowded audience, including many well-known musicians, on the 11th ult., one composed to sacred words by Dr. Haydn Keeton, the other entitled "The Knight of Elle," and written by Dr. W. H. Sangster. Both were received with deserved applause, though the works were not without faults.

PAISLEY.—An excellent performance of the Oratorio, Samson, was given on Friday evening, November 30, by the members of the Tonic Sol-fa Institute, under the conductorship of their indefatigable trainer Mr. John A. Brown. The concert was held in the Free High Church. The Institute were fortunate in securing the valuable assistance of the Glasgow Resident Orchestra, Mr. H. C. Cooper being leader, in the absence of Mr. Carrodus. The solo singers were Miss José Sherrington, Miss Jennie Pratt, Mr. Selwyn Graham, and Mr. Winn. The manner in which the Choruses were rendered throughout deserves great commendation.

PECKHAM.—A Choral Society, already numbering between sixty and seventy members, has been recently established here, under the able directorship of Mr. Henry Regaldi, R.A.M. The practices commenced on November 9.

PERTH.—On Wednesday evening, November 28, the members of the Euterpeon Society gave their first Concert of the season, assisted by the orchestra from Glasgow, led by Mr. Carrodus. The first part of the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Walpurgis-Nacht the performance of which was highly creditable to all concerned. Mrs. Hempel conducted. The second part consisted of Solos by Mr. Carrodus (violin) and Mr. Howell (violoncello), the Overture "Calm Sea" (Mendelssohn), a movement from the Eighth Symphony (Beethoven), Sarabande (Massenet), and the Overture to Zampa (Hérold), which were all excellently given.

REDHILL.—The Harmonic Society gave a performance of Handel's Samson in the Market Hall, on the 11th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Carina Clelland, Miss Emily Dones, Mr. William Shakespeare, and Mr. Lewis Thomas; principal violin, Herr Louis Ries; trumpet, Mr. T. Harper; honorary Conductor, Mr. H. T. Pringuer, Mus. Bac., Oxon, F.C.O. The performance was a great success, and the hall was crowded.

ROCHDALE.—The first Concert of the season was given on Tuesday, 27th of November, in the Town Hall, by the members of the Amateur Orchestral Society. The vocalists were Miss Topliffe, Mr. Rickard, and Mr. Gow. The pieces for the orchestra were selected with judgment, and played with ease and precision, the Overture to Semiramide being an especially excellent performance. Mr. Sedgwick, of Bury, was the Conductor, and Mr. Lofthouse the leader.

RUGBY.—Miss Emily Lawrence gave a very successful Concert on the 12th ult., assisted by Miss Ada Patterson, Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke, and Miss Florence Stanbroke, Mr. Sidney Tower, Mr. W. Henry Thomas, Mr. John Thomas (Harpist to Her Majesty the Queen), and Sir Julius Benedict. Miss Lawrence's solos (Première Ballade, Chopin; Prelude and Fugue, No. 4, Book 1, Bach; and Rondo Piacevole, W. Sterndale Bennett) were extremely well received.

SKIBBEREEN.—On Thursday the 13th ult. a Concert was given in the Town Hall, on which occasion a compact orchestra, consisting of about sixteen or eighteen of the principal members of the Cork Orchestral Union, under the direction of Mr. W. Ringrose Atkins, performed the Overtures to Martha (Flotow), Zanetta (Auber), and Le Chevalier Breton (Hermann), Haydn's "Surprise Symphony," an orchestral Fantasia "Hibernia," by the Conductor, and several other works. The vocalists were Mrs. Morrough, Mrs. Downes, Mr. W. Harvey, and Mr. N. Jackson.

STAFFORD.—A Gregorian Festival (the first of the kind) was held in the fine church of St. Mary on the 28th of November. The choir, surpliced, numbered some 200 voices. Mr. C. Warwick Jordan accompanied the service, and gave an Organ Recital afterwards. The local papers speak highly of the success of the Festival.

ST. NEOTS.—On Thursday the 13th ult. a Concert was given in aid of the Funds for providing an organ for the Offord Darcy Church, Hunts. The chief vocalists were Mrs. L'Estrange Ewen, Miss Buckley-Rutherford, Miss Hopkins, and the Revds. Gray and Miles. A feature of the evening, apart from the singing, was a solo on the violoncello by the Rev. H. L'Estrange Ewen. The concert was under the able directorship of Mr. Rees, Organist to All Saints', Huntingdon.

SWANTON, MORLEY.—A very successful musical entertainment, with readings, was given in the Schoolroom on Wednesday, the 12th ult., by the church choir, under the direction of their teacher, Mr. W. W. Pearson, of Elmham. The Choruses and Part-songs were well rendered. The most effective pieces were Stevens's Glee "From Oberon," and Mr. Pearson's Part-song "The Iron-founders." Mrs. Greer, Mrs. Rowntree, Miss Edwards, Mr. H. B. Vincent, and Mr. Rowntree contributed solos, duets, and trios. Mrs. Greer accompanied, and played several pianoforte solos.

TRALEE.—A very successful Concert, under the conductorship of Mr. B. M. Gilholy, was given in the County Court House, on Tuesday evening, the 4th ult. The programme consisted of selections from the works of Rossini, Donizetti, Balfe, &c. The Choruses, chiefly operatic, were excellently performed by about twenty-five voices. Solos were sung by Miss Wallace, Mrs. Iredell, Mrs. Erskine, Messrs. McGuire, Stephens, McGillicuddy, and E. Murphy. "Erin," a gracefully written Irish ballad, by Mr. B. M. Gilholy, was well rendered by Mr. McGuire, and rapturously encored. The proceeds of the concert were in aid of local charities.

WELLINGBOROUGH.—Handel's Messiah was given at the Corn Exchange by the Philharmonic Society on the 17th ult. with much success. The principal vocalists were Misses Banks and Marion Severn, Messrs. Thornton and Winn. The Conductor was Mr. W. R. Harrington.

WEYBRIDGE.—On Thursday, the 29th November, the members of the Choral Class gave the first Concert of the season, under the conductorship of Mr. H. P. G. Brooke. The programme contained many favourite pieces, all of which were well rendered. Mr. Brooke presided at the pianoforte.

WEYMOUTH.—Mr. Boyton Smith gave a Concert in the Assembly Rooms on the 17th ult., which was well attended. Mrs. Wells, Mrs. Whitaker, Mr. O. Christian, Mr. J. P. Collett (violin), and Mr. Nicholson (flute) were the artists engaged. The programme was miscellaneous. Mr. G. Thorne was accompanist, and Mr. Boyton Smith, solo pianist.

WINDSOR.—On the 29th of November a Concert was given by the boys of St. Mark's School. The first part consisted of selections from Barnett's Ancient Mariner, the soloists being Messrs. G. P. and W. F. Hawtrey (tenors), Master G. W. Floyer (contralto), and Mr. J. H. Webster (bass). The second part was miscellaneous. Mr. F. W. Webster accompanied, and Mr. J. H. Webster conducted.——The members of the Windsor and Eton Choral Society gave their first Concert of the season on the 3rd ult. in the Town Hall, when Sir Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria was performed. The principal vocalists were Madame Worrell-Duval, Messrs. Hunt and Ramsbottom, and Master Arthur Smith, of St. George's Chapel Choir. The band and chorus numbered upwards of fifty performers. The second part of the programme consisted of Romberg's Lay of the Bell. The choruses were well sustained. Sir George Elvey conducted, and Mr. J. S. Liddle, Mus. Bac., led the band.——The second of Mr. Dyson's Subscription Classical Concerts took place on the 13th ult., in the new concert room, Thames Street. The following were the performers, Herr Otto Peiniger (first violin), Mr. J. Earnshaw (second violin), Mr. Webb (viola), and Mr. Charles Ould (violoncello). The solo for the violin, Prelude and Fugue in G minor, by Bach, played by Herr Peiniger was encored. Signor Adelmann sang a couple of arias with great taste, and was much applauded. Mr. J. S. Liddle, Mus. Bac., presided at the piano.

WISBEACH.—An entertainment of vocal and instrumental music, &c. (under the auspices of the Alfred House Lodge of Oddfellows for the benefit of the North Cambs Cottage Hospital) was given in the Working Men's Hall, on the 6th ult. Various songs were given by Miss Anderson, Mrs. H. Sharpe, Miss Carlyon, and Messrs. Gregory and Nicholl. Several pieces were well played by the Philharmonic Band (under the leadership of Mr. C. King, Organist of the parish church). The entertainment was a great success, and about £15 15s. will be handed to the Treasurer of the Hospital.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The Festival Choral Society opened the concert season of 1877-78 with a most successful Concert, in the Agricultural Hall, on Friday, November 30. The programme consisted of classical and popular music. The artists were Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Mdlle. Ida Basilier, Miss Anna Williams, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, Herr Conrad Behrens, M. Claude Jaquinot; piano and accompanist, Mr. Frederic H. Cowen; Conductor, Mr. W. C. Stockley. The choir sang in excellent style Leslie's "Resurgam," Macfarren's setting of Kingsley's poem "The Sands o' Dee," and a very effective Part-Song, composed for, and dedicated to Mr. Stockley and the members of the Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society by Mr. Gaul, entitled, "Song and melody awake." The encores were numerous.

WOOLWICH.—Miss Mascall gave a Concert in the Town Hall on Friday evening, the 7th ult., on which occasion a Cantata, entitled "Christmas," both words and music the composition of the concert-giver, was performed for the first time. The solos were sung by Miss L. Lockwood, Miss Nellie Roberts, Mrs. Furlong, and Mr. and Mrs. Sallenger. Miss Mascall accompanied.

WORCESTER.—Mr. Spark's second Concert of the season was given at the Music Hall, on Thursday evening, the 6th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The programme, which was miscellaneous, was well selected. The artists were Mdlle. Basilier, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, and Herr Behrens (vocalists), Mr. Cowen (pianoforte) and Monsieur Jaquinot (solo violinist).

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Arthur H. Ridgway, Organist and Director of the Choir to St. David's Church, Bissell Street, Birmingham. —— Mr. Adrian G. Stride to SS. Peter and Paul's Church, Grays, Essex. —— Mr. F. Hale, Organist and Choirmaster to St. John-the-Baptist's, Islington.——Mr. Alfred Palmer to the New North Road Wesleyan Church.——Mr. J. Shaw, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mark's Church, Manningham, Bradford.

CAROLS FOR USE IN CHURCH DURING CHRISTMAS AND EPIPHANY. By R. R. CHOPE, M.A., Vicar of S. Augustine's, South Kensington, &c. The Music edited by HERBERT STEPHEN IRONS, late Organist of Southwell Minster. With an introduction by S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Rector of East Mersea, Author of "The Lives of the Saints," &c. In this work there are Carols for Christmas Eve, Christmas Day, S. Stephen, S. John, Holy Innocents, New Year's Eve, New Year's Day, Circumcision, Epiphany, Sundays after Epiphany, Conversion of S. Paul, Purification of B.V.M. The Traditional Carols are from different counties and countries—the modern by well-known authors.

"The Epiphany Carols are a noticeable feature in the book, and give it a special value. Mr. Chope has done a real service by the publication of this book."—Guardian.

"Bids fair to become as popular as his former work."—Morning Post.

"By far the best and most copious collection of carols. We earnestly recommend it."—Literary Churchman.

"A real treasure—an admirable book."—John Bull.

"The best and most copious by far."—The Choir.

"A book of genuine musical interest, fitted for popular and congregational use."—English Churchman.

"We welcome with great pleasure Mr. Chope's 'Carols for Use in Church during Christmas and Epiphany.' The music is most carefully edited by Mr. Herbert Stephen Irons, who has introduced some original melodies; and there is a learned and interesting historical essay by Mr. Baring-Gould. This book should be found at all Christmas choir festivals. Well adapted for the Church services."—Saturday Review.

Applications for grants of Carols, Music, or Words should be made to the Rev. R. R. CHOPE, Wilton House, Hereford Square, South Kensington.

SOUTHWELL SCHOOL SONGS. First series, 1s. 6d. By the Rev. R. F. SMITH, Minor Canon of Southwell.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Queen.—"Fourteen" (sixteen) "capital little songs in a cheap handy form. Quite new and withal pretty and neatly written."

The Schoolmaster.—"Easy, pleasing tunes, suitable to school use. The composer shows himself a true musician; each 'lay' has a separate tune, which is catching, appropriate, and quite in old ballad-song style."

The Musical Times.—"The sympathetic and musicianlike manner in which he has wedded them to melodies which cannot fail to please the young vocalists for whom they are expressly designed."

A DICTIONARY OF MUSICAL TERMS

EDITED BY

J. STAINER, M.A., MUS. DOC.,
Magd. Coll., Oxford,

AND

W. A. BARRETT, MUS. BAC.,
St. Mary Hall, Oxford.

The following Gentlemen have contributed to this Work:—

BOSANQUET, R. H. M., Esq., M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford.
BULLEY, J., Esq., M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford.
CHAMPNEYS, F., Esq., B.M., M.A., M.R.C.S., of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, late Radcliffe Travelling Fellow of the University of Oxford.
CHAPPELL, W., Esq., F.S.A.
DONKIN, A. E., Esq., M.A., F.R.A.S., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.
ELLIS, A. J., Esq., B.A., F.R.S., F.S.A., F.C.P.S., F.C.P., Trinity College, Cambridge.
GADSBY, HENRY, Esq.
HELMORE, Rev. T., M.A.
HULLAH, JOHN, Esq.
MCNAUGHT, W. G., Esq.
MONK, W. H., Esq.

"Among articles which, though not absolutely indispensable in a Musical Dictionary, are well worth reading as treated in the Dictionary edited by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, may be mentioned 'applause' and 'dedication.' Indeed, apart from its high value as a work of reference, the Dictionary is interesting throughout."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, comes to supply the deficiency just at the time when people are waking up to the advantages of accuracy in all sorts of arts, and it is most welcome. Its title gives a very humble idea of its importance, suggesting rather dry definitions or technical explanations than what it really contains. The definitions and explanations are all there, and their multitude is truly astonishing, even the most out-of-the-way words receiving consideration; but besides this there is a great quantity of valuable essays, not only by the editors, but also by men well known to the public for successful labours in the field of music and acoustics, such as Mr. Hullah and Mr. Ellis, the translator of Helmholtz, and Mr. William Chappell and Mr. Helmore."—The Academy.

"A 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett (Novello, Ewer and Co.), deserves especial mention, as the first attempt to supply the English reader with something that is not a limited glossary of technical words, but an encyclopædic book of reference on matters musical, such as German and Italian students have for some time been fortunate enough to possess."—The Graphic.

"In addition to this, the editors have derived information from many other equally good sources, so that the work is as trustworthy as it is complete, and professional and amateur musicians will alike owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett for one of the most useful musical works ever produced."—Standard.

"It is the general character and tone of the volume that concerns general amateurs, who, at a little cost of time, can obtain from this volume information on theoretical and scientific subjects, without having to wade through complex works. The Dictionary displays careful research generally, and it is also imbued with an impartial spirit, which goes far to beget confidence in the writers. The book is illustrated with diagrams of instrumental workmanship, and is printed in very large and clear type."—The Athenæum.

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS.

18, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON, W. ON THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT. { "This most ingenious and valuable invention cannot fail to meet with success."
SYDNEY SMITH. "The touch is absolute perfection."
BRINLEY RICHARDS. { "A very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"The tone of the Grand now referred to possessed all the qualities that a good piano ought to have, and in touch and action was perfect. The sweet and silvery quality of the upper octaves was worthy of special admiration."—The Era.

"Sir Julius Benedict played his well-known composition, 'Where the Bee sucks,' on one of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Grand Pianos, with the recently patented improvements, which enabled him to produce the sustained tones with great variety of effect in the light and shade of tones, especially so when extreme delicacy of touch is required."—Court Journal.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"Admirable repetition, perfect sostenuto, and luscious tone of the instrument fully justified the performer's choice."—Sunday Times.

"Magnificent, grand, the air telling out with almost vocal clearness and sweetness to the bell-like treble arpeggio accompaniment, which contrasted excellently with the extraordinary power produced in the forte passages."—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

"An immense improvement in arpeggios. The rapid passages in the upper register, the beautiful flute-like tone, and quick and perfect repetition, were very effective."—Figaro.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' CONCERT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"Sir Julius Benedict, now seldom heard as a soloist, delighted the public once more by his arrangement of 'Where the Bee sucks.' He played upon a new Patent Grand by Brinsmead, possessing a remarkably loud and clear tone."—Echo.

"The upright Iron Grand Piano, with sostenente sounding-board, the mechanism produces the obvious result of a fuller and richer tone."—Morning Advertiser.

"Every means are adopted to insure the production of perfect instruments."—The Orchestra.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action

"Where all the pianos go to seems somewhat of a mystery, for a really good instrument will last a lifetime: and yet every year thousands are made by each of the great London manufacturers, while the numbers made by the 200 or more smaller firms must represent an enormous number in the course of each year. The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is produced than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.

"A perfect check, great power, and quick repetition."—Times of India.

"Produces a better quality of tone, greater durability, the new patent perfect repetition, with a check (never before attained), with the certainty of the instrument never blocking."—Land and Water.

"Beautiful, light, and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, the touch and facility of repetition are really perfect."—Belgravia.

"The advantages fully justify the term 'Perfect' Check Repeater Action."—John Bull.

"The touch is very sure, light, and elastic."—Musical Times.

"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.

"The latest and greatest improvements in the pianoforte."—City Press.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

On the Three Years' System.

"Receive the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

THE

(THE MOST PERFECT OF AMERICAN ORGANS).

The Name of "BURDETT" is a household word throughout the United States of America in connection with the higher types of the AMERICAN ORGAN, he having been the Inventor of almost all the special improvements which have raised the instrument above the level of the European Harmonium, and given to it its present artistic value. The same creative genius and practical skill still characterises all his productions, rendering the "Burdett" the most perfect representative of the American Organ in existence.

The Instruments can be seen and examined at the Central Depot for the United Kingdom, and Descriptive Illustrated Catalogues will be forwarded on application.

ESTABLISHED 1804.

PRIZE MEDAL, LONDON, 1862. | GOLD MEDAL, SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.

The only Firm who obtained the International Exhibition Medal for the special distinction of "excellence of touch and tone."

WITH CHECK ACTION, IN ELEGANT WALNUT OR ROSEWOOD CASE.

FROM 29 GUINEAS.

"The Pianettes manufactured by CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments."—Anton Rubinstein.

"I can testify in the strongest manner to the qualities of the Pianette as manufactured by CHALLEN & SON. In every point, as to tone and touch, they are excellent; and I can also certify from experience as to their durability under hard wear."—William Henry Monk, Professor of Music in King's College, London.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL SEMI-COTTAGE,
WITH CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 32 GUINEAS.

"The Pianos I have selected from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate."—William H. Cummings.

"As a customer of some years' standing, I speak with confidence of the quality of the instruments supplied by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON. The two I have for my own use have had a great deal of wear, and in this respect have entirely satisfied me as to their durability; and the tone and touch of all those selected by me for myself or pupils have been much commended."—Alfred Gilbert, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL COTTAGE;
TRICHORD THROUGHOUT; BRASS BRIDGE; CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 60 GUINEAS.

"I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos. Their qualities of tone and touch can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability."—Lindsay Sloper.

"CHALLEN & SON is a name synonymous with wonderful durability, great beauty of tone, and moderation in price. We know of not one single maker whose Pianos excel theirs in the qualities most desirable in a good and lasting Piano."—Cape Argus, May 7.

EXCELLENCE IS GUARANTEED, AND EVERY INSTRUMENT WARRANTED TO BE OF THE HIGHEST CLASS WORKMANSHIP AND MATERIALS.

GENTLEMEN,—The Harmonium gives the greatest satisfaction, and is really the best instrument I have fallen in with.—Yours truly,
W. P. M. SLATER.
39, Franklin Street, South Shields, May 6, 1876.

GENTLEMEN,—By a mistake in the address the Harmonium was left at a wayside station, so that I did not get it here till last night; however, it is uninjured and gives me every satisfaction. Its tone and workmanship are admirable, and in rapidity of touch it is quite equal to a large Alexandre Percussion instrument, on which I sometimes play. I shall always be glad to recommend your Harmoniums.—Believe me, faithfully yours,
W. F. ASHBRIDGE, M.A., Curate of Bessingby.
Bessingby Road, Bridlington, Dec. 15, 1876.

Mr. J. M. Boulard, Manager of the Alleghanians, Vocalists and Bell Players.

DEAR SIR,—The Harmonium you made for me in travelling case answers our purpose exceedingly well, and my company are all delighted with it.—Yours truly, J. M. BOULARD.
Sept. 16, 1876.

GENTLEMEN,—Kindly find cheque for the Harmonium to hand. I may add that our people are very much pleased with the instrument. It is a little gem.—Yours faithfully, J. W. H. WOOD.
Shirland and Higham School Board, Shirland, near Alfreton,
Feb. 2, 1877.

DEAR SIR,—The Harmonium arrived here yesterday. I am much pleased with it, and it is a very pretty, nice-looking instrument.—Yours truly, DAVID BRUCE.
Merrington Vicarage, Terry Hill, Dec. 10, 1875.

GENTLEMEN,—The Harmonium arrived here in capital condition last week. I am very pleased with it. The tone is exceedingly sweet and pleasing. All who have seen it here like it very much.—Yours faithfully, H. R. HOLME.

WARD'S

ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,

FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

ALFRED STONE MEMORIAL FUND.

Treasurer.

THE RIGHT WORSHIPFUL THE MAYOR OF BRISTOL.

In consequence of the unexpected death of Mr. Alfred Stone (the Editor of the "Bristol Tune-Book," and Choirmaster of the Bristol Musical Festival) at the early age of 37, leaving a widow and ten children, a Public Meeting was held at Bristol on January 10, 1878, under the presidency of the Right Worshipful the Mayor, at which it was resolved to raise a fund by public subscription for the benefit of the widow and family of Mr. Stone, and as a testimony of respect to him.

Subscriptions may be paid to Mr. Frederick Morgan, Clare Street, Bristol; or to the West of England Bank, Bristol.

BEETHOVEN AND THE MODERN SCHOOL.

By H. Heathcote Statham.

Among the composers and critics who represent the modern "spasmodic" school (if we may adopt an epithet originally applied to a somewhat similar development in poetry) it seems now to be regarded as a settled and unquestionable fact in musical generation that Beethoven was the father of this most aggressive class of musical reformers and prophets. The coryphæus of the school—the musician who, whether justly or not, has conquered for himself the highest pedestal of fame among living composers—has distinctly posed as the successor of Beethoven. The Wagner Opera is, we have been told, the Beethoven Symphony turned into its proper channel, within which only it can prove a fertilising stream for the future development of music. Some of the literary satellites who revolve round the sun of Bayreuth put the matter even more plainly and definitely. Instrumental music, they assure us, spoke her last possible word in the penultimate movement of the "Ninth Symphony." The composer himself recognised the fact; and, in adding to the final movement a chorus to obtain the full expression of his ideas, for ever stamped the unaided instrumental form as deficient. After this any further resumption of the attempt at purely instrumental composition was to be regarded as a progress backwards, an attempted revival of a form of art always deficient in its results and illogical in its basis, and now finally to be shelved; and the career of Beethoven was to be considered as interesting and valuable for us mainly as a passage to the Wagnerian form, as the transition from the restricted "dance-forms" of composition to the vastness of the "forest melody" unmarked by form and unshackled by rhythm.

It is yet too early a day to express definite conclusions as to the real value of the new form of dramatic music which has made such a stir in the world, or as to the place it is destined to occupy in the history of the art. Nor would it be possible here, and within the limits of an article, to go into the question of the necessity of rhythmic form in music, involving as it would a philosophical disquisition on the very meaning and basis of the whole art. But the light in which Beethoven is regarded by the modern school, both absolutely and in relation to its own theories, is a more tangible and comprehensible subject for discussion, and one which is of some importance to musical criticism; for whether we regard instrumental music as an end or only as a means, the aims and achievements of the composer who, as all admit, carried it to the highest point, must be of lasting interest in the history and analysis of the art.

The old notion that Beethoven was a composer essentially abnormal, mystical, and given to wild flights and startling surprises, has hardly yet been eliminated from the popular musical mind. Whilst he has thus been misconstrued by the many, who keep up vaguely a kind of survival of the first criticisms that were directed against him by the orthodox dilettanti of half a century ago, we find his genius now placed in another kind of false or half light by an earnest esoteric school of critics, who represent him as employed in the continual struggle to give to his music a meaning which eventually he found only possible by the addition of words, as a "tone-poet" limited and shackled in his art by the fetters of musical form and construction which he tended constantly to evade or rise above, and as achieving his highest efforts only in those latest compositions in which he had more or less realised his emancipation. Waiving, as was observed, the abstract question as to musical forms, what is here contended is that this view of Beethoven's position in the art is absolutely erroneous and inconsistent with the facts presented by his works; that he was essentially an artist in temperament and in method, aiming at the highest and most detailed finish in the greater part of his compositions; and that those in which clearness of musical form is sacrificed (as in some of his later works it is) to the endeavour after a more direct emotional expression, do not represent an advance, but a deterioration, as compared with those in which the form is more complete and comprehensive.

The last clause of the indictment is of course one of those points which are subjects of opinion and of criticism, not questions of fact. But as to the view with which Beethoven himself most probably regarded his art during the greater part of his career, we may put together a strong presumptive evidence in favour of the views here advanced—evidence which may be said to be of a threefold nature, derived from what we know of the man and of his artistic habitudes, from consideration of the style of his compositions taken separately, and from a comparison of their general tendency when regarded in relation to each other and to the chronology of their production.

In regard to the traits of the man himself it is not safe to take too much au sérieux the isolated remarks made by so wayward a man as Beethoven on the spur of the moment, or perhaps in the petulance of contradiction or mystification. It is however on such remarks that the idea of his being essentially and intentionally a "poetic basis" composer seems to have been founded; on his having said, "It is thus that fate knocks at the door" in regard to one phrase, and "Read Shakespeare's 'Tempest'" in reply to a question as to the key to two of his Sonatas: remarks, the motive of which may have a very wide interpretation. At all events, if we are to give weight to these expressions, we must give equal weight to the fact that he pronounced Handel, that most practical of composers, to be "the greatest master of all masters." But if we take what is on record of Beethoven's artistic life and practice, we do not find the shadow of a reason for supposing that he set out with any idea of having a Mission, with a large M. He was an artist with a thorough respect for the technique and craft of his art. He might have sneered, in his moods, at Albrechtsberger's contrapuntal studies, but he worked hard at them for all that; and his systematic elaboration of his ideas is curiously shown in so late a composition as the Finale of the "Eighth Symphony," the brilliant and pointed subject of which appears in the first sketch in so bald and uninteresting a form:—

Like every healthy-minded musician—like Handel, Bach, Mozart, and Mendelssohn—he had a strong dash of the virtuoso about him; was proud of his playing, in which he was distinguished for an unusually powerful left hand, and liked to excel in feats of extemporisation. Nothing can be more characteristic of this than the well-known story of his victory over Steibelt, when he "drummed out a subject" from the violoncello part of the latter's Quintett, and proceeded to develop it in a manner that effectually annihilated his soi-disant rival (a kind of modern version of the story of Apollo and Marsyas); and nothing could be more at variance with the modern "moral" view of music, which would deny any value to such an improvisation unless based on a distinct poetic motive capable of being expressed in words. We find this "virtuoso" element continually cropping up in the course of his artistic life, from the time when he electrified the audience, as Ries tells us, by shouting "Bravo!" as the young player got triumphantly through the difficulties of a cadenza which he had (by the composer's permission) introduced into the C minor Concerto, to the latter end of his life when he gave such careful directions to Czerny as to the way in which his nephew should be taught to finger such passages as—using all the fingers, "so that they may go very smoothly. Such passages may indeed be made to sound very perlés, or like a pearl, played by fewer fingers; but sometimes we wish for a different kind of jewel." True, with his lips he inveighed occasionally against "bravura," but that did not prevent him from writing the finest bravura Sonata in existence (the "Waldstein"); and it may be suspected that all he disliked was a composition which was bravura et præterea nihil. And how suggestive, in regard to this question of the attitude of the composer towards his art, is the brief note we get from Ries as to the way in which the Finale of the "Sonata Appassionata" came into existence—one of the most distinctly "poetic," certainly, of all his works. They had been taking a long walk, and the composer had been keeping up a kind of howling, up and down, without articulating any distinct sounds. Upon Ries asking him what he meant by this he said, "I have just thought of a subject for the last movement of the sonata." When they got home he "ran to the piano without taking his hat off, and continued storming over the keys for an hour, until the Finale, as we now admire it, was struck out. Then turning round, and for the first time noticing me, he said, 'I cannot give you a lesson to-day, I must work.'" Thus it should seem that this great movement was to a certain extent actually composed at the key-board, evolved out of an hour's "strum." Yet this was one of the Sonatas concerning which he said, "Read Shakespeare's 'Tempest.'" *

How thoroughly again (to come to our second section of illustration) Beethoven was possessed of that essentially artistic spirit of work which shows itself in the acute critical perception of means to an end, we need not go beyond the range of the pianoforte Sonatas for ample evidence. Although in some few cases he seems desirous of treating the piano as an orchestra—at least of giving to its handling something of the breadth and largeness of style demanded by orchestral composition (the Introduction and opening Allegro of the "Sonata Pathétique" being the first marked instance of this)—as a rule it is astonishing to notice, in turning over these familiar pages, not only how varied but how entirely suited to the means and mechanism of the instrument are the themes and the ornamental devices in which they are set. As to the first point, the invention of ornamental figures for the instrument, no successor among composers for the piano (as Mendelssohn on his own part frankly owned) has a chance after him, Chopin alone perhaps excepted; but, even with the far greater licence of style and manner which Chopin allowed himself, there is a great sameness about his figure passages as compared with Beethoven's. And amid this wonderful variety there is nothing knotty or ungracious for the player. With the exception of the Op. 106 Sonata and one or two isolated bits in others of the late sonatas, every passage, however brilliant and difficult in one sense, lies well for the hand, and presents no unnecessary awkwardness of form or mechanism. Contrast them with the passages written by Schumann and Brahms for the piano, and the superior artistic fitness of Beethoven's style is beyond all comparison, not to speak of its generally superior effectiveness. Even if we put aside the great volume of pianoforte Sonatas, and take the miscellaneous solo works, we may put together a couple of these, the "Variations and Fugue on the Air from 'Prometheus'" (the precursor of the "Eroica" Finale) and the "Thirty-two Variations on an Original Theme in C minor," and find in these the groundwork of the whole series of modern pianoforte effects.* Only one source of pianoforte effect, perhaps, can be said to have been really invented since, that of which Thalberg claims the credit, the sustaining of a theme by raising the dampers while the hands are both employed in ornamental excursions, and which has suffered such enormous abuse among popular writers for the instrument. In fact the subject of Beethoven's method of treating his favourite instrument is far too large to speak of in a paragraph, further than to draw attention to the general evidence which it affords of his artistlike method of work and close attention to the details of his craft, and of the importance he attached to finish of form and suitability of means to the end.

As to the larger question of symmetry of form in composition, it is of course easy to see that in his earlier works, such as the two first Symphonies and the pianoforte works of the earlier period, Beethoven was for the most part as symmetrical in form as Mozart; what is not recognised is that he is so for the most part in his later works. By symmetrical in form it is here meant that he draws out his movements on a fixed plan and adheres to it strictly. Popular opinion has in fact credited him both with more dependence on precedent in his earlier works, and more breaking away from it in his later ones, than is consistent with fact. In the face of such compositions as the C minor Trio (Op. 1) and the A major Sonata (Op. 2), it is nonsense to talk of his being dependent on Mozart and Haydn at the outset. The youthful productions, in which he really was repeating their style, he did not allow to appear in the catalogue of his numbered compositions. On the other hand, although it is easy for those who wish to gain a hearing for musical monstrosities to remind us that the Symphonies in C minor and A major were derided by the players who first executed them, it may be concluded that the non-appreciation of those works arose from the novelty and, to ears of that day, extraordinary character of the themes themselves, rather than from any great eccentricity in the framework of the composition. The first movement of the C minor Symphony is rather irregular in plan, certainly; but the final movement is symmetry itself. Take the slow movement of the A major Symphony again, perhaps the most intensely pathetic thing that Beethoven ever wrote; do we find here that passion is allowed to break the bounds of musical

* The other was the one in D minor, Op. 31. The fact of the expression being used in regard to two works so little connected with each other in date and manner seems to show that the reply was merely a vague observation to turn off the question.

* The "Thirty-three Variations" on Diabelli's Waltz would at all events supply any deficiency of suggestion; but this work cannot on artistic grounds be ranked with the two others. Though larger in scale it is much more loosely constructed, and has attracted an exaggerated interest on account of its difficulties and their splendid execution by one or two great players; a remark which may also apply to the Op. 106 Sonata, the longest but not the greatest of the composer's pianoforte solos.

form? There is just one trivial deviation from the straight path in the bar—which at least I have always felt to be superfluous in performance, characteristic as it is, as it has no relation to any other feature of the movement; but except that there is not a bar that is not in its right place or that does not seem naturally to result from the plan of the whole, even to the symmetrical incident of the chord for wind instruments placed at the opening and close of the movement, the portal through which we enter and leave this strange region of sighs and consolations. Or take such a work as that called the "Moonlight Sonata," which in style and form was the most complete novelty that even Beethoven ever produced—which was utterly unshadowed by any precedent in pianoforte music—and see if you can find a bar or a note that can be displaced in it, that is not rigidly in keeping with the plan and structure of the whole. The form was new, but it is as complete a form, as strictly adhered to as such, as we could find in any of the works of Bach. Or, to come later in the series, take the two sets of variations in E and C, in the Sonatas Op. 109 and 111, and see whether in these latest pianoforte solos Beethoven is not as symmetrical in form as in the three first Sonatas.* It would be a tempting and pleasant task to carry the argument further by calling attention to the wonderful and delicate elaboration of detail in his great Symphonies; to note how each instrument has its own individual part precisely suited to its genius; to observe how infinite is the variety of little beauties and graces which are all subordinate to the whole design, and never obtrude themselves: but space forbids.

"But the 'Ninth Symphony'"—say the modern critics—"does not the whole of Beethoven's work lead up to that, and does he not in the Finale expressly quit the field of regular form and of pure instrumental music, and thereby acknowledge it to be a thing played out?" Now just look at the absurdity of this argument. Because the last Symphony he wrote had a chorus to it, therefore instrumental music was to be at an end. Suppose he had died after writing the "Pastoral Symphony;" then of course "he had arrived at the conclusion that the right province of instrumental music was the description of nature." Suppose he had died just after the production of the "Choral Fantasia," then we should have had, "Beethoven had recognised that the pianoforte, unsupported by voices, could have no place in the music of the future:" but fortunately he lived to write some of his finest solo Sonatas after this. Then, because the Concerto in E flat was his last and greatest, we have had it repeated ad nauseam that he had recognised that the old Concerto form was worked out, and had said his last word in that form; but unfortunately M. Thayer has discovered that the manuscript of nearly the whole first movement of a later Concerto is in existence, of very orthodox form as far as it goes, and the opening of it was engraved in one of the Crystal Palace programmes, and the piano part commences with a show chain of shakes, a piece of immoral bravura display! So much for theories and facts. But the idea that you can make out a progress from pure music to "poetic basis" music out of Beethoven, an evidence of a theory consistently carried out, is an illusion. Twist him how you will, he will not fit it. The "Eroica" was an admittedly "poetic" Symphony, and its Finale is irregular and rather captious in form: the next Symphony to it is the most finished work he ever wrote, and the most purely formal of all his Symphonies. The next solo pianoforte work after the "Adieux Sonata" is the Polonaise in C; and the variations which close the last sonata of all are as purely music for the sake of music, as devoid of any effort at inner meaning, as precise in form, as a toccata of Bach's; and this, together with the Diabelli Variations—a piece of the same genre, though very inferior—was in progress contemporaneously with the "Ninth Symphony." As to that extraordinary work, the first movement, though very large and sometimes vague in outline, is moulded by a consistent form; the Scherzo is nearly complete in form; the slow movement is one of the most exquisitely finished and symmetrically developed, as well as one of the most beautiful, of all the composer's works. But in regard to the Finale I venture to assert, speaking as a reverential and I trust not unintelligent lover of Beethoven, that in spite of the noble and pure beauty of the leading theme, and of the glimpses of a sublime musical perspective which open up here and there in its progress, the movement as a whole is not what it is asserted to be; that it is not worthy of the position that has been given to it among the composer's works; that much of it is crude, harsh, and formless; that many of those who hear it feel (if they would confess the truth) a certain sense of relief when it is over; and that no educated audience would pretend to think it the composer's crowning work if they did not allow themselves to be led by a clique of critics who have a theory to uphold.

There is one other special point in which Beethoven is misrepresented by the said school of critics. They try to make him out to be an accomplice in the preparation of a modern receipt for composition called the "metamorphosis of themes." This is a contrivance whereby a composer who is deficient in original and spontaneous melodic ideas may, when he has been lucky enough to hit upon one melody, make it do duty for a whole movement or even a whole Symphony, by repeating it with varieties of form and rhythm, cutting out a note or putting one in, and mauling it in other ways; thereby not only exercising a wholesome economy in the use of his ideas, but gaining also the credit of having imparted a remarkable "unity of expression" to his composition. This crutch has been found so useful to lean upon that the literary followers of Liszt and Wagner have felt compelled, in proving their idols to be the hereditary successors of Beethoven, to show that he also leaned upon the same crutch. And very instructive their efforts are. One of them, who is known as a first-class pianist and a writer of indifferent English, and whose playing is heard too seldom and his English seen rather too often, attempted a little while ago to cut Beethoven to fit this theory, in an article directed to that end in Macmillan's Magazine. Among the few examples which this critic was able to make out in support of his view, it will scarcely be credited that one was an attempt to see in the theme of the Fugue of the B flat Sonata a repetition of the theme of the first Allegro, by arbitrarily picking out certain notes in the scale passages of the fugal theme and empha-

* Since the above remarks were written I have chanced upon the following passage, certainly very apropos, in Beethoven's notes to his own contrapuntal studies, which shows that his symmetry of form in his best works was the result of deliberate and early formed judgment. Excusing himself for neglecting some of the strict rules of the theorists, he says, "Let me not be supposed to advocate an impertinent contempt of the great principles of art, which are unchangeable. I would only say that as time advances art has also advanced in many things. Invention and fancy must not be denied the rights and privileges of which schoolmen, theorists, and barren critics would gladly deprive them. . . . And yet I would advise a composer rather to be commonplace than far-fetched in his ideas, or bombastic in the expression of them." with the opening bars of the following slow movement:—

sising them. Another example lay in the comparison of the closing chords of the first Allegro of the "Waldstein Sonata"—

Granting the asserted resemblance of the two passages, which it is not very easy to see, the first one is not a "theme," hardly even a "phrase;" it is a mere battery of chords to close the movement. But the absurd part of it is that the critic, in his anxiety to discover what he was looking for, forgot the fact that the Adagio was not the original movement—that the Allegro was originally followed by the now well-known Andante in F, afterwards discarded because it made the sonata too long, when the present short Adagio was substituted. Any idea therefore of the one movement being evolved out of the other in the progress of composition must be set aside. Such are the straits to which people are driven who are determined to find their artificial theories in Beethoven's music.

The foregoing remarks merely glance at and suggest a view of a subject far too large to be illustrated in detail here. But if, as is believed, the unbiassed study of the life and works of Beethoven, apart from any attempt to make a theory, shows him to have been not only a poet in feeling and expression, but also essentially a consummate artist in musical form—if we recognise that, where in a few instances in his latest compositions he has comparatively neglected form and finish, there he has also fallen below his usual mark in his effect upon competent and unprejudiced listeners—we must conclude, whatever the future of music may have in store for us, that no theory of the art which excludes symmetrical form and finish and subordination of detail can really claim to be based upon the art of Beethoven, except in the sense of being an amplification and systematic reproduction of his few comparative failures.

MUSIC IN CONNECTION WITH DANCING.

By Charles K. Salaman.

Music and dancing are identified to a great extent with the drama of ancient Greece and Rome. The chorus originated the drama. The term choros was used for the song and dance, as well as for the singers and the dancers. In its inception the chorus was a festive choral dance. In like manner the term orchestra was used for the performers of the dance and also for the place in which they danced. Tragedy was the development of human passion, expressed by means of language, dancing, and singing. The chorus moved slowly or rapidly in accordance with the expression of the verse they sang. They advanced and retreated in three rows of five dancers, or five rows of three. When they moved from the right hand to the left it was called Strophe, when from the left hand to the right it was called Antistrophe. Brumoy observes that music was only a more agreeable manner of vocal expression, as dancing was a more graceful mode of movement. Tysias (B.C. 556) was the first to teach the chorus to dance, and for that he received the name "Stesichoros." He is mentioned by Plutarch among the early melopæists, whose custom it was to adapt their verses to appropriate melodies. Out of the choral hymns which were sung to Bacchus, with movement and gestures, arose Tragedy. The magnificent Chorus to Bacchus in the "Antigone" of Sophocles is regarded as an image of the ancient Greek tragedy in its first rude state. The goatlike appearance of the satyrs, who sang and danced the Bacchic hymns, is said to have suggested the term Tragedy. Comedy was at first styled Trugodia, in consequence of that kind of dramatic entertainment being associated with the season of the grape harvest. Both tragedy and comedy were invented in Icarium, a small village of Attica. At the Bacchic festivals, which partook of a religious character, a goat was sacrificed by the priests, amid joyous choral songs and dances. A dramatis persona was afterwards added to the chorus. This actor recited verses, with mimetic movements and characteristic gestures, alternately with the chorus, which, in consequence, become subsidiary to the dramatis persona. This was the simple form of the Tragedies of Thespis. Then Æschylus appeared, B.C. 525, and added to the chorus many dramatis personæ, developing tragedy into a broader and nobler form.

A dramatic poet of antiquity was expected to possess multifarious qualifications. Skill in the arts of music and dancing was necessary to enable him to teach the chorus to sing and to dance. He had often to compose music to his own verses. Aristophanes in one of his comedies represents Æschylus saying,—

> I myself taught these dances to the chorus,
> Which pleased so much when erst they danced before us.

The choral odes of his dramas are said to have been long held in remembrance, on account of their exquisite sweetness, and the purity and loftiness of their tone. Aristophanes said of his songs, "They are as sweet as the honey of the bee;" "He is the master of all singers." But though the verse of Æschylus has the sweetness of honey, it is more characterised by the majesty and wild grandeur of the sea, as, for instance, the choruses in "Prometheus Bound."

Telestes was the chorus director. In Æschylus's tragedy, "The Seven against Thebes," he made all their acts intelligible by means of dancing. In the "Eumenides" of Æschylus, the chorus of the Errineyes moved round and round in solemn weirdlike measure, while they chanted the following verses:—

> Come, then, let us form our chorus,
> Since 'tis now our will to utter > Melody of song most hateful,
> Telling how our band assigneth
> All the lots that fall to mortals, &c.
> Plumptre's Translation.

Sophocles and Euripides still further developed the genius of tragedy, which, "in its pure and perfect state," says Francklin, "was made subservient only to the noblest purposes, and sacred to truth, religion, and virtue. This species of the drama attained to its highest degree of perfection in the time, and under the direction, of the immortal Sophocles, the acknowledged prince of tragic poets, the admiration of all Greece, the envy of his contemporaries, and, in a word, the Shakespeare of antiquity."

In the second Antistrophe of the Chorus to Bacchus, in the "Antigone" of Sophocles, which Mendelssohn has so magnificently set to music, we discover the true relationship of dance and song to the drama of the ancients:—

> Immortal leader of the maddening choir,
> Whose torches blaze with unextinguished fire,
> Great son of Jove, who guid'st the tuneful throng,
> Thou, who presidest o'er the nightly song,
> Come with thy Naxian Maids, a festive train,
> For thee the dance prepare, to thee devote the strain.
> Francklin's Translation.

Thespis, Pratinas, Cascinius, and Prynichus were designated the "dancing poets," because they not only made their dramas depend in a great measure upon dancing and singing, but, while directing the performance of their own plays, they taught the chorus to dance; and they did not always limit to them the instruction they gave in the terpsichorean art.

In the departments of literature and the fine arts Rome borrowed from Greece, but, being specially a warlike nation, the Romans did not exhibit so fine a taste, nor so great a passion for the highest branches of the dramatic art, with its essential accompaniments of music and dancing, as the Greeks.

Fescennia, a city in Etruria, lent her name to a kind of dramatic entertainment, consisting of chanting and dancing with suitable gestures. The harvest celebrations, which induced hilarity and license, suggested the Fescennine verses. With this primitive kind of semi-dramatic performance the Romans were entertained for nearly three centuries. Rome was visited by a terrible pestilence about B.C. 364. In order to withdraw the attention of the people from its devastating effects, the Roman Senate invited to the city a company of actors from Etruria, to assist at the celebration of their festivals. Livy tells us that, as the Romans could not understand the Etruscan language, the foreign actors did not speak, but described by mimetic action and music only the scenes they desired to represent. They placed themselves in attitudes to the sound of a flute. The Romans were fascinated with this novel foreign importation, which they declared was infinitely superior to their own dramatic representations. They neglected their ancient Fescennine verses, and encouraged the introduction of dance and song into all their entertainments. This modification led to another kind of dramatic performance, which obtained the title of Satura or Satire, because it was composed of every kind of verse. These Satires were recited with suitable action, and accompanied by dancing and instrumental music. They were specially remarkable for wit, sharp banter, and brilliant repartee.

Horace, Juvenal, and Persius borrowed the idea, and wrote poems under the name "Satire" which have become immortal. Scaliger was under the impression that the ancient satiric poem of Rome was derived from the Greek (σατυρὸς). It has, however, been proved by later scholars that the Roman satire had no relation whatever to the earlier satyric drama of Greece, which came from an entirely different source. Livius Andronicus, a famous dramatist (B.C. 200), introduced other changes into the Roman drama. Whilst he danced to the accompaniment of a flute, he assigned the acting and singing to a younger member of his dramatic company.

The Roman pantomime was carried to perfection in the reign of Augustus, in the first century; and that kind of dramatic performance maintained its popularity up to the sixth century. Pantomime was the designation of the entertainment as well as of the performers (mimi vel pantomimi). The pantomime was to be "all the actor." A deep political design is supposed to have influenced Augustus in the institution of the pantomime, viz. to divert the thoughts of the people from dwelling on their loss of liberty. "The pantomimes," says Gibbon, "expressed, without the use of words, the various fables of the gods and heroes of antiquity, and the perfection of their art, which sometimes disarmed the gravity of the philosopher, always excited the applause and wonder of the people. The vast and magnificent theatres of Rome were filled by 3,000 female dancers, and by 3,000 singers, besides the masters of the respective choruses. Such was the popular favour which they enjoyed, that, in a time of scarcity, when all strangers were banished from the city, the merit of contributing to the public pleasures exempted them from a law which was strictly enforced against the professors of the liberal arts." The historian Ammianus complains that the streets of Rome were crowded with females whose sole employment appeared to be curling and dressing their hair. The Roman historian tells us that, since the fall of the Republic, the tragic and comic muse of Rome, who seldom did more than imitate the Greeks, were now quite neglected, and that "their place was unworthily occupied by licentious farce, effeminate music, and splendid pageantry."

In the time of Augustus there were two very famous pantomimes, named Pylades and Bathyllus, between whom there was strong rivalry and constant warfare. The former was the favourite of the plebeians, the latter of the aristocracy. Partisanship was as warm then as in later times between the Handelites and Buononcinites, and the Gluckists and Piccinists. The noble Mæcenas, who had owned Bathyllus as his slave, manumitted him on account of his dramatic talents. Bathyllus had invited Pylades to Rome, and had obtained for him the favour of his own patron, who procured for both pantomimes the patronage and countenance of Augustus. Bathyllus—who was an Egyptian, a native of Alexandria—composed the tragic dances, and added to them a kind of "Ode to Apollo." The dances of Pylades are described by the ancient writers as "stately, pathetic, and laborious."

A theatre was built expressly for Pylades and Bathyllus capable of holding 80,000 persons. It was always filled in every part. Horace compares the applause of the Roman spectators, and the expression of their disapproval, to the rushing of waters. It is not difficult to imagine what must have been the roar of such immense audiences. In addressing his friend Mæcenas, he says,—

> Vile potabis modicis Sabinum
> Cantharis, Græca quod ego ipse testa
> Conditum levi, datus in theatro
> Cum tibi plausus,
> Care Mæcenas eques, ut paterni
> Fluminis ripæ, simul et jocosa
> Redderet laudes tibi Vaticani
> Montis imago.—Car. i. 20.
> Sabine wine poor thou'lt drink in modest goblets,
> Into Greek cask I myself racked and sealed it,
> Knightly and dear Mæcenas, when the applausive
> Theatre hailed thee;
> So that the banks of thine ancestral river,
> So that in choral symphony the sprite-voice
> Haunting the Vatican mountain, sportive Echo, > Rang back the plaudits.—Lord Lytton's Translation.

Pylades was a man of inventive genius, and introduced many dramatic reforms. To the Roman orchestra, which before his time consisted only of flutes, he added every known musical instrument, besides a chorus of dancers. The emperor reproved Pylades for the rivalry which continued between him and Bathyllus, and which too much engaged the attention of the Roman people. Pylades replied boldly, "It is expedient for you that the attention of your people should be occupied with our quarrels." He was once banished on account of the pantomime disputes, but was soon recalled.

The earliest metrical compositions of ancient Rome appear to have been the Hymns which were sung and danced by the Salii, the twelve priests of Mars, to the honour of that god. The Salii was an institution of martial priests, who made dancing and music a very important part of their worship. The Salian festival began on the 1st of March and continued for several consecutive days. During that time the Salii sang and danced about the city of Rome apparelled in a picturesque costume, of which Plutarch gives the particulars, their heads being covered with a conical-shaped cap of great height. They had charge of the ancilia, or sacred shields of Mars Gradiva. While they sang hymns and danced they struck their shields with a short kind of rod, in order to mark the rhythm of their steps and bodily movements. Their dance was intended to give an idea of martial ardour, exercise, and activity. There was no approach to levity in their gestures; but, on the contrary, they were stately and dignified, and calculated to impress their spectators with sentiments of awe and reverence. The priests were selected for the nobility of their countenances and the majesty of their deportment. Only such as could support the dignity of the sacerdotal office were deemed qualified to become members of this martial institution. The sons of patricians only were considered sufficiently noble to be admitted as members of the priestly order of the Salii. The following is Horace's poetical allusion to the festival of the martial priests:—

Nunc est bibendum, nunc pede libero
Pulsanda tellus, nunc Saliaribus
Ornare pulvinar deorum
Tempus erat dapibus, sodales.—Car. i. 37.

Now is the time, companions, for carousal,
Free now the foot, to strike the earth in dances,
For Salian banquets now
Decked be the couches on which the gods repose.
Lord Lytton's Translation.

The Bacchanalian feasts, or Dionysia, were among the most famous of the ancient Roman festivals. The leading incidents of the wine-god were on these occasions represented by mimetic dancing and music, both vocal and instrumental. Those who entered with spirit into these wild orgies, crowned themselves with garlands of fir, ivy, and vine, and they thus ran about the hills and surrounding country like lunatics, nodding their heads, and dancing in measured steps to the sounds of pipes, flutes, cymbals, and drums, while they rent the air with horrid cries. The Bacchanalia of old Greece found their way to Rome through Etruria. A senatorial decree, however, soon banished them from the city. Even amid the wildness of the Dionysiac festivals the proud Romans preserved their state and dignity. They were passionately fond of processional dances, accompanied by noisy instruments of music, cymbals, sistra, and drums. The annual festival entitled "Pompa," to celebrate a victory over the Latians, was originally held in honour of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva; but it was afterwards dedicated to all the gods. Hymns were sung, accompanied by processional dancing, in which the most distinguished members of the priesthood and the army took part. Dancing, except in alliance with religious rites, public games, dramatic entertainments, or national festivals, was held in no esteem by the ancient Romans. The illustrious Scipio did not disdain to dance on state occasions. We have this on the authority of Seneca. A Roman freeman considered it beneath his dignity to dance except at religious ceremonies. Cicero remarked that a man who would dance must be either mad or drunk. The Roman emperors do not appear to have shared this opinion, for many of them were passionately addicted both to dancing and music. Tiberius, who could neither dance nor sing, prohibited public dancing, and banished professional dancers. Caligula, on the contrary, encouraged singing and dancing, and, after a prolonged debate in council, he ended the conference with a dance. Nero gave his countenance to music, and also publicly exhibited his vocal powers. It appears, however, that "music," in his case, did not "soothe the savage breast;" and that, although he was very musical, he yet was "fit for stratagems and spoils." Domitian expelled from Rome every senator who had ever been seen to dance. Of ancient Roman music we unfortunately know nothing, except that it was derived from Greece, of whose music we also know nothing more than its scale and its system, to which, perhaps, may be added the traditional accounts of its marvellous effects which have been handed down to us.

The rural feasts of the ancient Romans, which were held in honour of the heathen goddesses, at various seasons, were celebrated with singing and dancing. In the autumnal season a statue of Pomona was set up, decorated with fruit and flowers. Before this image groups of youths and maidens danced. They advanced to the sound of pipes and flutes with graceful movement and stately steps. Flora held her court in the spring. She was also represented by a statue decked with flowers. In the summer season the most shady parts of woods were selected for dancing and singing and playing on the flute. A young maiden, chosen for her beauty and her high rank, was selected to personate the goddess Ceres. The festival was presided over by a "Choragus," or leader of the dance and chorus. They danced to "stirring tunes" and "beautiful airs," but unhappily no relics of these melodies have come down to us.

We have now to speak of the musical instruments by which, in ancient times, the dance and song were accompanied.

The most primitive instruments of percussion, to mark the measure of the dance, in its rudest state, were probably pieces of wood or stone struck one against the other, or the clapping of hands. Tune was unknown and was not dreamed of. Rhythmic music must have been invented long before tuneful sounds. Musical instruments of percussion preceded wind instruments. Stringed instruments were the last invented. The flute family was a large one, and included tibia, or pipes, and all instruments whose sounds were produced by blowing through reeds or hollow pieces of wood pierced with holes to vary the sounds. Flutes were of various kinds, but were all held in the same manner as the oboe and clarinet. According to Horace the flute was at first very small, and it produced only feeble sounds. This instrument gradually grew larger and more important, and, bound in brass, it rivalled the sound of the trumpet of ancient times. There were Lydian, Pythian, and the deep-toned Phrygian flutes, the latter being used to accompany martial dances, and also upon grand and solemn occasions, on account of the loudness of their tones. At the time when Thebes was destroyed, one statue alone was preserved, on which was inscribed, "Greece has declared that Thebes has won the prize upon the flute." It required great exertion to blow well upon the flute, and it was not an uncommon occurrence for a flute-player to die from the rupture of a blood-vessel. An ancient distich ran thus:—

Nature gave brains to flute-players, no doubt,
But, alas, all in vain, for they soon blow them out.

Lucian mentions a young flute-player, named Harmonides, who died from exhaustion while performing at the Olympian games. Flute-makers and flute-players gained immense sums of money. A fee equal to £200 sterling was paid to a famous flute-player. Ismenias, according to Lucian, paid three talents (a sum equivalent to £581 sterling) for a flute. Flute-players lived in great state. "He lives like a flute-player" was a common adage. Ismenias was once engaged to play the flute at a religious sacrifice to accompany the dance. His employer, impatient at the non-appearance of the expected omen, snatched the instrument from him and commenced to play. The omen appeared. "You see," said he to Ismenias, "that to play well is a gift of the gods." "Most truly," replied the great flute-player; "when I played, the gods were so ravished that they delayed the omen in order to listen to me; when you played, they hastened the omen to silence your noise!"

Amphion the Thespian says that in Helicon there were dances of boys got up with ease; and he cited this ancient epigram:—

> I both did dance, and taught the citizens
> The art of music; and my flute-player
> Was Anacus, the Phialensian.
> My name was Baccides of Sicyon;
> And this, my duty to the gods, performed,
> Was honourable to my country Sicyon.

Athanæus also speaks of some youths who "danced very cleverly together, alternating in figures with one another, while others stood by making a clapping noise with their forefingers." He says that, while Demodocus was singing, youths just entering manhood were dancing; and he mentions that while a boy played the harp they "danced round and sung in soft well-measured time."

The sistra, the cymbals, the timbrel, the cylindrical maces, various kinds of drums and tambourines, besides harps, lyres, and psalteries, and also a kind of primitive castanet, much like the "bones" of the "Ethiopian Serenaders," were other musical instruments used in ancient times to accompany the dance.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

We have seen from our master's letters with what almost boundless patience he bore the yoke imposed upon him by an unreasonable parent, and how, at last, smarting under insults such as only the meanest nature could endure, he asserted his independence and, to use a homely phrase, "set up for himself." There now remains to show, in so far as the demonstration casts light upon his character, in what manner Mozart perfected this step by assuming the duties and responsibilities of a husband and head of family.

If a special providence be visible anywhere we seem to discern it in the connection of Mozart with the Webers. The reader will have in mind his encounter with that family at Mannheim, the love which sprang up between Wolfgang and Aloysia, his visit to her en route from Paris to Salzburg, and the rupture of their engagement. One might have expected that an incident so painful could do no other than separate those concerned for good and all. But when Mozart reached Vienna in the train of the archbishop, lo! the Webers were there, the father being dead and Aloysia (now Madame Lange) having an engagement at the Court Theatre. Wolfgang soon renewed his friendship with them, as appears in a letter to Leopold describing how he had been ordered to give up his lodgings in readiness for an anticipated return to Salzburg. "I packed up my things hurriedly," he writes, "and old Madame Weber was so kind as to take me into her house, where I have a pretty room and am with obliging people, ready to supply me at once with all that I require." Then came the quarrel with the archbishop. Mozart remained in Vienna, and, what is more, remained with the Webers, to the great alarm of Leopold, who keenly scented the danger of his son's falling into matrimony. The old man appears to have written upon the matter, in his usual bitter way, again and again, until at last Mozart announced his resolve to leave the dangerous house, adding, "I shall have to invent some plausible excuse to satisfy the excellent woman (Madame Weber), for I really have no cause to go away." Meanwhile, scandal-mongers were at work both in Vienna and at Salzburg, whither a certain Herr von Moll, who had "a very malicious tongue," carried abundance of tittle-tattle. All this duly came back to Mozart through the anxious father, and induced him to write a letter which cannot even now be read without pain. After giving a general denial to the current reports, he goes on, "If ever there was a time when I thought less of marriage than at any other, it is now. I have no wish whatever for a rich wife, but even if I could make my fortune by marriage I could not pay my court to any one at present, having very different things in my head. God has not bestowed talents on me to invest them in a rich wife, and to waste my youth in idleness. I am just beginning to live, and shall I myself embitter my life? I certainly have nothing to say against matrimony, but it would be a misfortune to me at the present time." All this sounds very earnest and hearty, but was it not more adapted to quiet the old man's suspicions than consistent with actual fact. Let those who know human nature judge when I point out that within five months afterwards Wolfgang wrote to Salzburg for permission to marry Constance Weber. Mozart adds to the words just quoted some particulars of his intercourse with the family which light up one at least of his father's weaknesses, and show also with what nervous anxiety they were consulted. "The girls seldom go out, indeed never, except to the theatre, and I never escort them there, because generally I am not at home when the play begins. We went together twice to the Prater, but her mother was with us, and as I chanced to be in the house I could not well refuse to accompany them; besides at that time I had heard none of these foolish rumours. I must also tell you that I was only allowed to pay my own share." The italics are not mine, they are Mozart's, and they tell us how well the composer knew that money had much to do with his father's anxiety. Wolfgang with a sweetheart, and then a wife, would have less cash to spare for Salzburg, so Wolfgang must rejoice in neither, and must be driven to confess that when he took ladies out for an afternoon in the park they paid their own expenses. Poor fellow! Which was worse, this or Count Arco's kick?

Acting upon his resolve, Mozart removed to a new lodging, and told his father that he missed a great many comforts, adding, with a subtle knowledge of what argument the old man could best appreciate, "When I had anything very urgent to finish, the Webers always waited dinner for me as long as I chose . . . . whereas now, unless I pay additional, and have dinner served in my own room, I lose at least half an hour by dressing, and must go out, particularly for supper." From this time, August 1781, till December of the same year the Webers do not appear in Mozart's correspondence. But one of them at least was in Mozart's heart, and the composer could not rest till an open avowal of the fact had been made. An obscure hint escapes him at the close of a letter to Salzburg, written

December 5: "I am to remember that I have an immortal soul! Not only do I think of this, but I firmly believe in it. Were it not so, in what would consist the distinction between men and animals? Just because I both know and believe in this have I been unable to fulfil all your wishes in the way you expected." The last sentence perplexed the old man, who quickly wrote to demand its meaning. In answer Mozart made a clean breast of the whole matter. First of all he stated his purpose: "My endeavours are directed at present to securing a small but certain income, which, together with what chance may put in my way, may enable me to live and—to marry." Then he alleged his reasons: "My feelings are strong, but I cannot live as many other young men do. In the first place I have too great a sense of religion, too much love for my neighbour to do so, and too high a feeling of honour to deceive any innocent girl." Besides he wanted somebody to look after him, to take charge of his linen and clothes, and generally to complete his existence; for, said he, "an unmarried man enjoys only half a life." From this he proceeds to name the chosen one: "Do not be startled, I entreat. Not one of the Webers surely? Yes, one of the Webers—not Josepha, not Sophia, but the third daughter, Constance." Loverlike, he rhapsodises about his "good and beloved Constance," in terms which, if the old man had a heart in his bosom, must have made it thrill with sympathy: "The third [daughter] is the martyr of the family, and probably on this very account the kindest-hearted, the cleverest, and in short the best of them all. She takes charge of the whole house, and yet does nothing right in their eyes. . . . . She is not plain, but at the same time far from being handsome; her whole beauty consists in a pair of bright black eyes and a pretty figure. She is not witty, but has enough of sound good sense to enable her to fulfil her duties as a wife and mother. It is utterly false that she is inclined to be extravagant; on the contrary, she is invariably very plainly dressed, for the little her mother can spend on the children she gives to the two others, but to Constance nothing. Yet her dress is always neat and nice, however simple, and she can herself make most of the things requisite for a young lady. She dresses her own hair, understands housekeeping, and has the best heart in the world. I love her with my whole soul, as she does me. Tell me if I could wish for a better wife. . . . I have thus opened my heart to you and fully explained my words. . . . Pray have compassion on your son."

Throughout this noble and manly letter there is only one thing that gives pain, and it lies in the subjoined sentence: "All I now wish is that I may procure some permanent situation (and of this, thank God, I have good hopes), and then I shall never cease entreating your consent to my rescuing this poor girl, and thus making, I may say, all of us quite happy, as well as Constance and myself; for if I am happy you are sure to be so, dearest father, and one-half of the proceeds of the situation shall be yours." These italics, unlike the former ones, are my own. Prominence should be given to such a unique spectacle as that of a son bribing a father to let him marry. Mozart's avowal, on its way to Salzburg, crossed a letter from the old man, which thoroughly aroused his indignation. It seems that Peter Winter, true to his unhappy nature, had told Leopold Mozart the story of Wolfgang's engagement to Constance, and also that he had been entrapped into a signed contract of marriage. Thereupon the father wrote savagely to the son, who, addressing his sister, exclaimed, "Good heavens! I have this instant received such a letter from my dear good father! What monsters there are in the world in the shape of men! But patience! My anger and fury are such that I can write no more, except that I will answer the letter by the next post, and prove to my father that there are men who are worse than devils." He did this in a letter, beginning, "I am still full of wrath and indignation at the shameless lies of that arch-villain Winter," and going on to tell the whole story of the contract which the guardian of Constance had insisted upon as an alternative to forbidding the connection altogether. The contract was, no doubt, a bit of sharp practice, inasmuch as it bound Mozart to marry within three years or pay to Constance an annuity of 100 ducats. But it served to test the lover's ardour, and brought out the maiden's confidence. "What did the angelic girl do when her guardian was gone?" writes Mozart; "she desired her mother to give her the written paper, and saying to me, 'Dear Mozart, I require no such document from you; I rely on your promise,' she tore it up." The contract destroyed, and the guardian pledged to secrecy on the whole transaction—a pledge he at once broke—Mozart said nothing about it to his father, who, however, soon became, acquainted with it, as we have seen. On the 9th of January Wolfgang had not heard further from Salzburg, and was more anxious than ever. "I again ask your forgiveness," he writes, "and beg you to be indulgent and merciful towards me. I never can be happy or contented without my beloved Constance, but without your cordial consent I shall only be partly happy. Make me wholly so, my dearest and best father, I entreat." Within a day or two came what Mozart calls "a long and affectionate letter" from the old man. Affectionate it may have been, but it contained some strong language, especially with regard to Madame Weber and the guardian, who, said the irate parent, "should sweep the streets in irons like criminals, and wear a tablet round their necks with the words 'seducers of youth.'" Moreover there was no paternal consent to marriage, only questions and counsel. Hence we find Mozart speaking out more and more boldly, saying that, if sure of good health, he would marry his "dear faithful Constance" at once. "I have now three pupils . . . I only want another, four being quite enough, which would make twenty-four ducats, or 102 florins 24 kreutzers. With this sum a man and his wife (in the retired quiet way we wish to live) might contrive to exist; only if I were to be ill I should receive nothing." So the affair went on without making real progress, Leopold Mozart complaining and pouring out doubts and suspicions, Wolfgang bearing all with amazing patience, and adopting various pathetic means of softening his father's heart towards the object of his choice. As though this were not enough, the sorely tried composer found that trouble invades even the sanctuary of love. In plain words, Wolfgang and Constance had a "tiff." The occasion was in this wise: one day when Mozart was at the Webers', Constance gaily told how, playing at forfeits, she had allowed a gentleman to measure the size of her leg. The lover instantly took umbrage, and so soundly lectured her upon the impropriety of such behaviour that Constance in turn became indignant, flew into a passion, and dismissed Mozart with the thrice-repeated assurance that she would have no more to do with him. All this we gather from an excellent letter addressed by the composer to his "dear and beloved friend," in which he declined to be dismissed. "It is not," he wrote, "a matter of the same indifference to me as it seems to be to you to lose the object of my love. I am not therefore so passionate, so rash, or so reckless as to accept your refusal. I love you too dearly for such a step." But he remained firm in his opinion of the offence committed, repeating, "No girl with becoming modesty would have permitted such a thing," and going on to say, with true magnanimity, "But the thing is past, and a candid avowal of your heedless conduct would have made me at once overlook it, and, allow me to say, if you will not be offended, my dearest friend, will still make me do so. This will show how truly I love you. I do not fly into a passion like you. I think, I reflect, and I feel. If you feel and have feeling, then I know I shall be able this very day to say with a tranquil mind, 'My Constance is the virtuous, honourable, discreet, and faithful darling of her honest and kindly disposed Mozart.'" Truly a model of loving and manly utterance is this, and it must be said for Constance that she accepted the rebuke, while in extenuation of her original fault we should remember the loose manners prevalent at that time in the Austrian capital. The lovers speedily kissed, "made it up," and became more loving than ever. Two months after this the marriage question pressed to the front again in most urgent manner. On account of Madame Weber's drinking habits, and for other reasons, the home of Constance was not exactly a place for Mozart's future wife, and he even contrived to get her away from it on a visit to his friend the Baroness von Waldstädten, which visit was prolonged from time to time. In this emergency the master wrote to Salzburg, "My dear kind father, I do implore you, by all you hold dear in the world, to give me your consent to my marriage with my beloved Constance. Do not suppose that it is marriage alone I think of, in that case I would gladly submit to wait; but I see that it is absolutely necessary for my own honour, as also that of my Constance, as well as for my health and peace of mind. My heart is troubled, my head confused; in such a state how is it possible to think or work to any good purpose? . . . I shall anxiously expect your consent, my kind father. I feel sure I shall receive it, for my honour and reputation are at stake." When this was written matters were on the point of reaching a crisis, for Madame Weber, irritated at the withdrawal of her daughter from home, resolved to appeal to the police, and Mozart on his side determined that, if the police had power to interfere, he would marry the girl out of hand, and not expose his darling to an insult from which, as his wife, she would be free. Under these circumstances it is not surprising to find him taking a bolder tone with his obstinate father: "I feel confident that you will give your consent to my marriage in your next letter. . . . Constance is a well-conducted good girl of respectable parentage, and I am in a position to earn at least daily bread for her. We love each other, and are resolved to marry. All that you have written or may possibly write on this subject can be nothing but well-meant advice, which, however good and sensible, can no longer apply to a man who has gone so far with a girl. There can therefore be no question of further delay. Honesty is the best policy, and cannot fail to insure the blessing of Providence. I am resolved to have no cause for self-reproach." Leopold Mozart did not answer "by return," and after waiting two posts Wolfgang, consent or no consent, took his Constance to the Theatines Church, where they confessed and received the holy communion, and where, two days later, they were married. Mozart himself describes the wedding, and says, with touching simplicity, "When the ceremony was over both my wife and I shed tears; all present (even the priest) were affected on seeing the emotion of our hearts." A day or two passed and then came from Salzburg the tardy consent and half-hearted blessing of the father, accompanied by a statement that, as he could expect no more assistance from his son, neither must the son hope, either then or thereafter, to receive anything from him. He added, with malignancy well-nigh inconceivable, a desire that the poor young bride should be told as much, and reproached Wolfgang with the baseness of his conduct. Yet even this did not affect Mozart's long-suffering. He thanked his father as warmly as though consent had been gracious, prompt, and free from upbraiding, only launching a sarcasm, perhaps unconsciously, when he said, "I entreat your forgiveness for my perhaps too hasty trust in your fatherly love."

Such is the story, as told by the letters, of Mozart's courtship and marriage; and if there be any one who does not think it, in respect of the chief actor, a noble story, I neither envy him his sense of the heroic nor his perception of the good. In it, to me, Mozart appears illustrious by a sense of filial duty, bounded only by the higher obligation expressed in the apostolic words, "For this cause, also, shall a man leave his father and mother, and cleave unto his wife." He appears illustrious not less by an affection which, harbouring no thought of self, sought only the happiness of the beloved one, and by a high-toned sensitiveness possible to none but an exalted nature.

Though the letters do not set forth Mozart's married life with the same minuteness, they reveal enough to prove that all was not quite as it should have been. Money to the composer was simply a means of instant gratification, and Constance as a manager hardly came up to the ideal of her ardent lover. The young couple soon began to "force the pace." They gave private balls in some unfurnished rooms next their own lodging, the gentlemen paying two florins each, the Mozarts the balance; and they got up a pantomime troop, in which Madame Lange was Columbine, and Mozart Harlequin. Adding to this that the master neglected remunerative teaching for composition and public performances, which paid but little, and we are not surprised to find him, six months after marriage, asking a loan of the Baroness von Waldstädten, to avoid being sued. In the autumn of 1786 the Mozarts had three children to maintain, and the master's want of worldly wisdom (for which we have reason to be thankful, since it arose in great measure from devotion to his art) landed him in such difficulties that he proposed a journey to England, and gladly accepted an invitation to visit Prague early in the following year. It was in the Bohemian capital that he received a commission to write "Don Giovanni," upon which Opera he was engaged when news of his father's illness made him send a last letter to the old man: one of touching interest, because showing how, amid all his enjoyment of life, the master had frequent thoughts of death, as though the shadow of coming fate even then rested upon him. Thus he wrote: "As death, when closely considered, is the true goal of our life, I have made myself so thoroughly acquainted with this good and faithful friend of man, that not only has its image no longer anything alarming to me, but rather something most peaceful and consolatory; and I thank my heavenly Father that He has vouchsafed to grant me the happiness, and has given me the opportunity to learn that it is the key to our true felicity. I never lie down at night without thinking that, young as I am, I may be no more before the next morning dawns." To a mind thus fortified death may come early, but can never take his victim unaware. Leopold Mozart passed away a few weeks afterwards; and in the same year (1787) Wolfgang lost his dear friend, Dr. Barisani. The shadows were closing round, and Mozart felt their chill presence as he said, "For him all is well; but for me—for us, and for all who knew him intimately—it never will be well till we are so happy as to meet him in a better world to part no more." "Don Giovanni" brought money to the household treasury, and a Court appointment added 800 gulden to Mozart's income, but pecuniary difficulties still harassed him. Hence, after borrowing from a brother Freemason, he resolved to try an artistic tour in North Germany. At this point begin the letters to his "dearest and sweetest wife"—letters overflowing with affection, and, though often written with an aching heart, full of good spirits. A few extracts will throw a flood of light upon the relations between this husband and wife. In one he says, "If I were to tell you all my follies about your dear portrait, it would make you laugh. For instance, when I take it out of its case, I say to it, 'God bless you, my Stanzerl! God bless you, Spitzbub, Krallerballer, Spitzignas, Bagatellerl schluck und druck!' and when I put it away again, I let it slip gently into its hiding-place, saying, 'Now, now, now!' but with an appropriate emphasis on this significant word; and at the last one I say quickly, 'Good night, darling mouse, sleep soundly.' I know I have written something very foolish (for the world, at all events), but not in the least foolish for us, who love each other so fondly." Again, "Now farewell, my best beloved. Remember that every night before going to bed I converse with your portrait for a good half-hour, and the same when I awake. . . . I kiss and embrace you 1,095,060,437,082 times (this will give you a fine opportunity to exercise yourself in counting), and am ever your most faithful husband and friend." This is the tone of all the letters to Constance, and examples need not be multiplied. But love cannot keep away trouble. The tour was no great success; Constance became seriously ill, and Mozart had again to borrow money. "If you can and will entirely relieve me," he wrote to Herr Puchberg, "I shall look upon you as my saviour on this side of the grave, for you will enable me to enjoy good-fortune hereafter on earth. If you cannot do so, I implore you in God's name for temporary aid, be it what it may, and also for counsel and comfort." This was in July 1790, and in the spring of the following year we find him again writing to Puchberg: "If you can and will extricate me from a momentary difficulty, pray do so, for the love of God. Whatever you can spare will be welcome." A month later he again applied to the same kind benefactor; "I am at this moment in such a state of destitution that I must entreat you, my dear friend, for Heaven's sake to supply me with what you can spare. . . . As to my debt to you of such long standing, I can only beg you to have patience. If you could only know all the sorrow and care it causes me! I am entirely prevented by it from finishing my Quartetts." In September of the same year Mozart made another effort to gain money by a tour, having first pawned his plate to buy a carriage. The letters to his wife were of course resumed, and in the old loving strain, of which the subjoined is a sufficient example: "I am as happy as a child at the thought of returning to you. . . . Were you with me I should possibly take more pleasure in the kindness of those I meet here, but all seems to me so empty. P.S.—While writing the last page many a tear has fallen on it. But now let us be merry. Look! swarms of kisses are flying about—quick! catch some. I have caught three, and delicious they are." But the second tour ended like the first, and again we find the master writing to his friends for money under the pressure of his wife's renewed illness, which obliged her to seek the air and waters of Baden, a village not far from Vienna. It was to Baden that, in October 1791, he sent a letter describing a performance of "Die Zauberflöte," then just produced, and ending with a quotation from the libretto of that Opera: "The hour strikes! Farewell: we meet again?" These are the last words of Mozart that have been preserved. A few short weeks after they were written a poor funeral procession traversed, amid storm and rain, the long and weary way from St. Stephen's to the cemetery of St. Marx; a coffin was lowered into the common fosse, and Mozart disappeared from the face of the earth, all his troubles over, and his much-tried spirit at rest. In him the world lost, as it now knows full well, not only a stupendous genius, but a loving son, a devoted husband, and a good man who could say, in articulo mortis, "It is a great consolation to me to remember that the Lord, to whom I have drawn near in humble and childlike faith, has suffered and died for me, and will look on me in love and compassion." These words might have appeared on a quickly raised monument, had men thought him worth one and remembered the exact place of his rest.

There only remains now to examine the Vienna letters for such light as they throw upon Mozart as an artist and musician.

THE LESSON OF THE TELEPHONE.

By Joseph Green.

It is not our province to lecture on physics, nor do we intend to reproduce any portion of Professor Graham Bell's explanations of the telephone, and of pulsatory, undulatory, and intermittent electric currents. We shall treat his marvellous, if embryotic, invention in regard only to its potential uses and their moral, which appears to be, "look out for squalls," and on all sides, and from, at present, any terrestrial distance.

Now that our more or less respectable and inventful, rather than eventful, century has entered into its seventy-ninth year, it is quite time even in our musical notions to put aside the last vestige of the fashions which prevailed in its teens, or even in its middle age. Surely the mind of the present generation itself must be growing placidly indifferent, and that of the rising generation will be absolutely callous, to perpetually recurring shocks to preconceived ideas. In former times, when people travelled seldom and slowly and always with vast impedimenta, they used to "make up their minds," as they called it. Now, no one makes up his mind at all, unless he is prepared for a continual state of mental unpacking and repacking. We simply carry with us as much opinion and conviction as will serve for the day or for the business in hand.

It is curious with what ease, and we may almost say ingratitude to the inventive geniuses who work for us, we accommodate ourselves to new appliances. To-day we lose our patience, and perhaps ourselves, in a labyrinth of pianos of doubtful genealogy at this or that musical emporium; to-morrow we shall be strolling unconcernedly to the telephone station in the next street to try the newest instruments at Vienna, Milan, or Paris. Our bargains will not be conducted in telegramic dots, or even in the present broken English or French of the "wires;" but with living voices in one language or another, or in half a dozen, and eventually perhaps in only one! The labours of science are expiating the sin of Babel. Can individualism, protectionist theories, or chauvinistic stupidities withstand the humanising influence of such mechanical appliances? Of course, sensible people, who are generally wrong, will tell us that our illustrations are simply fanciful and comical, and that piano-shops and music-shops in the twentieth century will, like everything else, be very much as they are now; and some musical oddity will add,

"With all your science and your telephones, can you give us another Beethoven or Mendelssohn?" The pretelephonic mind of the "oddity" might be amazed were we to tell him, "We do not want another Beethoven." It is rather the province of science to crush—to prepare the soil for newer productions. Science facilitates the development of any particular phasis in art. In the natural and historical order of things the school of music about to appear in Europe is inevitably the eclectic. We shall be reminded that it already exists. We think not. With the exception of Wagner, who is himself more of a preacher than a prophet, there is as yet in the newer music nothing but the reverberation of a very recent past. Eclecticism is more than that. It has a soul of its own. Its tendency is to soften and subdue the crudities of national characteristics and the mannerisms of local academies; to widen the sphere of the musician's sympathies, and suppress mere craftship and provincialism. It excels in taste and intellectual aims. It is usually the offspring of a cultivated age, and its demands are very exacting towards its devotees. It is in some respects the opposite to what appear to be the prevailing sentiments among recent German composers, who are intensely chauvinistic in idea, and a trifle "shoppy" in treatment. Wagner, indeed, has shaken us out of the straps, and tights, and poke bonnets of forty years ago; but his poetic leanings towards impossible national legends are somewhat retrograde and old-worldlike. Moreover, in his development of an ancient device, which we may anglicise as the "character-tune," he transgresses an eternal canon of art—the concealment of the means employed.

We can learn no more profitable lesson from the telephone, or any other similar reminder of the catholicity of art, than in asking ourselves the question, Is not our present admiration of everything that is German a species of servility? German character, literature, and music need no bush. Their very superiority has induced the kind of musical fetichism we complain of. Our critics are so habituated to look for Germanisms, not troubling themselves with other schools, that no sooner does an English composer present his work than one says, "That's Mendelssohn;" another, "That's the 'Lohengrin;'" whilst the music may resemble neither one nor the other more than is generally the case with compositions of the same era. We must attend to our ethnology in these matters. The musical and metaphysical elements in Germany are not Teutonic. The Bachs, by-the-way, were Bohemians by extraction. In England the basis of the musical temperament is Celtic. The element we possess in common with Teuton and Scandinavian is the love of that many-voiced harmony which, in the hands of a skilful composer, becomes a species of harplike connection with nature, stirring the depths of profound but often sluggish minds. It is nearly half a century since Mr. Carlyle, with his vivid reflections and reproductions, inoculated us with the substance of the German mind, and what has it produced? Whilst some of us are still floundering in transcendentalism, the Germans are coming to England for a newer philosophy. It may be that, whilst we are losing ourselves in impossible chords and in crude imitations of their rhapsodical harmonies, the Germans are quietly studying the melodic weaving of the old Italian contrapuntists. Certain it is that German music remains an exotic and has failed to amalgamate with the English genius; whereas in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries our poets drew genuine inspirations from Italy, and the mere breath of the Italian madrigal sufficed to animate a latent creative power whose musical monuments are still the greatest we possess, and almost the only ones that find acceptance abroad. The infallible test of music is its travelling properties; in other words—and, we may be allowed to say, in the words of our text—the merit of music is in its universality.

In spite of a quarter of a century of fire-horses and running to and fro, there is a débris in English society which for many a long year will cause the car of progress to jolt. We are sufficiently conservative to think it is well it should be so, not only because amongst the débris are things of eternal worth, but because new ideas have a trick of coming of their own accord, and are shy. They will not be grasped, neither will they be roughly handled nor put at once to work.

What may at least be done by way of preparation is to stamp out local and personal prejudices. Few of us would believe or care to acknowledge the miserable paternity of our smaller prejudices, were it placed before us. In fact it was placed before us graphically in Punch a week or two ago in the picture of the man of nose and the man of chin; each gentleman thinking that character resided in the particular feature in which he excelled. Thus the musician who fancies himself intellectual will tell us that unless we can distinctly separate the parts of the harmony and listen to their mechanism, it is inconceivable to him what pleasure we can take in music. But the man of sentiment will reply, he would as lief listen to a machine; and he is about right. Again, a man is an organist, and thinks Sebastian Bach is not only the greatest of musicians—which he is—but also the greatest of composers, which he is not. The violinist delights in Spohr. The pianist, who thinks all music must be cased in walnut or mahogany, dubs Spohr a virtuoso and prefers Mendelssohn. The light and quick man is impatient of adagios, whilst the slower man thinks only the ancient masters are worth playing, because neither his fingers nor his brain will move rapidly enough for the new. The precentor thinks all music is sacred, and sings comic songs only amongst intimate friends. The country-bred youth who has been reared in a manse, or at most in an organ-loft, will enjoy the delicious naughtiness of a first visit to the Opera; but until late in his career as a critic he will go about whistling "Ye banks and braes," and condemning Bellini as "jest a warbler of leet tunes."

Quite in accord with the gist of what we have been endeavouring to suggest, let us for one moment transfer ourselves to that revived amphitheatre or colosseum, the Albert Hall, South Kensington, on an Oratorio night. On such an occasion the sight alone is in its kind simply unrivalled. Sight and sound combined seem like the union of two civilisations. Let us suppose that we are listening to the quaint, original, and in its way beautiful chorus of Ishmaelites in Macfarren's "Joseph." To a person of ordinary cultivation, whose imagination is stirred by the music and the instrumentation, and who in reminiscence can separate Egypt from Edom, what need is there of scenery and costume, of daubed canvas, of spangles and theatrical paraphernalia? The scene of the arrival of the caravan from Gilead, carrying balm and myrrh to Egypt, together with the whole episode in the Scripture narrative, is brought vividly before us. And this effect, it may be remarked, without appearing to overestimate Dr. Macfarren's Oriental sketch, is attained by little more than a short melodic phrase given in unison, and again and again repeated with varying gradations of force and with different rhythmic figures in the orchestral accompaniment. The Cantata may therefore be considered the more intellectual entertainment, compared with the paint and limelight of the Opera, because, if it accomplishes nothing beyond the mass of sound and the mere music, it is in the highest degree suggestive to a mind generally as well as musically cultivated. In that respect it is like the pianoforte, the most intellectual of instruments, because, from its variety of timbre and its completeness, it is most suggestive; although in its absolute accomplishments it seldom gets beyond tinkle and clatter. There are, however, other points of comparison in which the Opera shows to more advantage compared with any form of concert or chamber music. Unfortunately, of late years, we have been rather accustomed to the Opera in over-large theatres. As royal boxes and grand tiers will not contain all of us, some must see the stage from a distance. Thus the often-repeated and acknowledged point of superiority of the Opera over even the spoken Drama is in a great measure lost. We allude of course to the simultaneity of action and expression in various characters in the concerted music. Without the Drama and accompanying histrionic excellence, the Opera is only a mixed spectacular and musical entertainment which we are many of us, in this still pretelephonic age, content to enjoy at an absurd expense, in most uncomfortable postures, and the vilest of atmospheres. But all that will change and is changing. Our musicians will find that as a school for the study of expression the Opera is incomparable; and it is in expression the English musician fails. Even the Oratorio has long since lost the colder majesty of earlier models. Unquestionably, in his latest work "Joseph," our veteran composer, secure in his matured experience and technical resources, has not felt afraid to return to his youthful reminiscences.

Musical invention is in all countries at this moment at so low an ebb that there must soon be a general flow in which we can all begin again with the same chance. It is better that English musicians should prepare at once for the race unshackled by any local, national, or sectarian prejudice. In former ages seas and mountain ranges promoted civilisation by compression in nooks and corners of the earth. Mechanical science will henceforth give it radiating power, and every musical composer may aspire in his vocation to be a teacher or a giver of delight beyond the boundaries of his parish or his metropolis.

When, in commenting in our December number upon the reply to the memorial presented to the Dean and Chapter of Worcester respecting the continuance of the Three Choirs Festival, we expressed a hope that "a well-organised system, which shall be satisfactory to both parties, may eventually be arrived at," it did not occur to us that the one powerful dissentient voice which has always been raised when compromise was even hinted at would be heard after an amicable settlement had been arrived at between the clerical authorities and the Festival Committee. Lord Dudley, however, is not to be silenced by anything short of the abolition of the Festivals in their present form; and has therefore written a letter to the Worcester Guardian, in which, after dwelling seriatim upon the conditions under which the Festival is to be held (as decided by the Bishop of Worcester), he makes a powerful appeal "to prevent, if possible, a going back to that which was not in disaccord with the feelings of Churchmen even fifty years ago, but is looked upon by them as a serious scandal now." Although we agree with Lord Dudley that merely calling the money paid for admission-tickets "a subscription" by no means gets rid of one of the objections—that of denying free admission—and saying a few words of prayer before the performances does not materially alter the other —that of presenting Oratorios in a cathedral—we cannot but think that his lordship thoroughly begs the question when he talks of the Festival being a "serious scandal" to Churchmen. Not only orthodox Churchmen, but a very large clerical body, see nothing but good in the perpetuation of meetings which have for their object the fostering of the cause of charity and the glorification of God by the aid of the greatest works in sacred musical art. Let us therefore trust that the friendly feeling which has now been revived in a city so long identified with these Festivals may be undisturbed in the future, and that Worcester may this year resume a position which it has so long and so honourably maintained.

We have not the slightest desire to deprive artists of any legitimate claim they may have to public patronage and support; but we cannot help thinking that, if those who advertise really hold the public positions they profess to do, there can be no occasion to publish the fact; and if they do not, the sooner they drop their self-created titles the better. A few of these which we have lately met with will suffice as illustrations. Passing over the old-established "celebrated bass," who, for aught we know to the contrary, may be "celebrated" in musical regions into which our duty does not lead us, we light on the name of a vocalist, certainly well known in the concert-room, who calls herself "first principal contralto, Royal Italian Opera, Drury Lane; Royal English Opera, Covent Garden; Sacred Harmonic Society, &c." Now if, under an assumed name, she occupied this position at our lyrical establishments, we shall be glad to be enlightened on the matter; but, in our record of the Italian Opera-houses at least, the "principal contralto" has never been an Englishwoman. Then we are startled by the advertisement of a "song-writer and composer," whose songs we are told, have for seventeen years "been the rage in every quarter of the globe and have proved the principal successes of every singer of note that has appeared." As we know such an enormous number of vocalists who have never been indebted to this gentleman for their "successes," we can only presume that they are not "singers of note." Another, who styles herself "first-class pianiste and vocaliste," inserts after her name "M. and A.C.P.," although what these letters may signify we have not the remotest idea. However, as we once heard a teacher say, letters always look like some kind of diploma; and not one in twenty, even of those who employ you, will ever ask what they mean.

In a letter to his friend Dwight of Boston, Mr. Thayer reveals the particular motive which led him to write and read at Trieste the paper on Beethoven now familiar, in substance at least, to our readers. The cause was Herr Nohl, a voluminous biographer whose undoubted industry has often been quoted as though it implied accuracy. Mr. Thayer has allowed Herr Nohl to go on for ten years printing slander and vituperation, but he can stand it no longer. "He has been publishing," writes the eminent American, "articles in newspapers and monthlies, has been delivering lectures and writing volumes on Beethoven, and finally a three volume biography, in all of which he has embraced every possible occasion to exhibit Beethoven's brothers and their wives, as well as the nephew, in the worst possible light." At last Mr. Thayer "felt it a duty to take the first, best occasion to show how baseless is much of the slander and vituperation with which he has endeavoured to overwhelm the memory of Johann van B. with infamy." He adds, "I have also desired to subject opinions so opposed to those which have prevailed for forty years upon the relations between the brothers and between Beethoven and Mäelzal to thorough criticism before giving them a more permanent place in a large work." For the work thus promised we shall wait anxiously; meanwhile it is something to have an instalment of justice done; and it is more to know that Herr Nohl, who writes so much, lacks the well-balanced mind necessary to a master of his craft, and instead of being a biographer is an unreasoning worshipper of idols, on which he can neither see speck nor flaw. That he should be regarded in this light Mr. Thayer's "Contribution to Beethoven Literature," with its calm and convincing array of facts, is sufficient to prove.

THE imaginative gentlemen who write "programme music" for the gratification of hysterical persons of both sexes should be careful, on their own account, to explain in words what they mean in sound. To their minds, no doubt, every phrase and trick speaks a definite language, but an audience includes various degrees of intellectual perception, and there is always a danger that what is meant for one thing may be taken for another, to the very great confusion of the general design. A case in point comes to us from America. Mr. Paine, Professor of Music at the University of Cambridge, U.S., has written a Symphonic Poem, à la Liszt, on the subject of Shakespeare's "Tempest," and of course represents in it some of the characters and incidents of the play. There is a storm, which few can mistake, although a sympathetic critic points out that it is not one of "nature's grand cataclysms," and a grotesque bassoon passes very well for Caliban, but the Professor's Ariel—"a pert little fillip on the piccolo"—by no means finds prompt recognition. One critic received the "fillip" as the boatswain's whistle, and spoke of it as such; while another, taking it in conjunction with a few preceding harp chords, launches out with a poetic reference to Ariel's harp and Caliban's squeal. It is really hard upon critics to make them liable to such mistakes, and if composers will give us vague sketches which stand for a hundred things just as well as for the one intended, they should imitate the young and modest draughtsman who labelled his nondescript figures as "a cat" or "a cow" according to intention. Seriously, music is degraded by such nonsense, and those men of talent who persist in making a noble art do showman's business, where it ought to be an independent attraction, incur a grave responsibility.

WE have lately drawn attention to some of the apocryphal stories told of Beethoven, and now it may be worth while to show how a lively and ingenious fancy has dealt with Weber. Some time ago that veracious journal Le Gaulois came out with a most surprising tale anent the author of "Der Freischütz." It appears that Weber was in London in 1811—a matter of which his biographers tell us nothing—and that one day, when walking on the banks of the Thames, he took a flute from his pocket and began to play. On the approach of some young officers, who, as everybody knows, always go about in uniform, the composer desisted. "Why do you stop?" asked one of the military gentlemen. "For the reason that made me begin," returned Weber. "And that is—" "Because I choose." "Very well, if you don't resume the performance, we will throw you into the river." Upon this the flute was again produced, but not before Weber gave his assailant a rendezvous for the following morning in Hyde Park. The officer punctually appeared, and found the composer waiting for him with a pistol. "You made me play the flute yesterday," said Weber, "and now I shall make you dance. Dance." There was no alternative, and the officer danced a "gigue nationale." "Now, sir," resumed Weber, "we are quits, and I am ready to give you satisfaction." "No, no," replied the young Englishman, "you are a man of spirit, and I was wrong to—. Shake hands, I beg you." Weber shook hands, and the two became fast friends. We have heard something like this before, but the joke of it as told of Weber is exquisite, he being about the last man in the world to play such a part as that assigned him.

WITH every desire to ventilate the opinions of our numerous correspondents on the system—or rather the want of system—of printing "accidentals" in music, we find that it would be quite useless to insert even one of the many letters we have received on the subject, because they all multiply instances of the careless manner in which, as a rule, the temporary contradictions of the original signature are marked—scarcely, indeed, any two composers agreeing in their method. Musical reformers must know how loth we are to admit any interference with the liberty of the subject; for even the important question of "pitch" continues to be settled according to the opinion of each Conductor. Many years ago Sterndale Bennett, seeing that there was a grave objection to the slur and the bind being represented by the same sign, slightly altered the bind, so as to make the two perfectly distinct from each other; but public opinion was too strong, and "that new thing"—as we have often heard it termed—has completely disappeared from the recent editions of his works. Were we called upon to declare our own opinion on the subject of "accidentals," we should say that "an accidental affects a note before which it is placed and every subsequent note of the same name and pitch in the same bar." We do not think it advisable to extend the influence of an accidental to the following bar under any circumstances; for, although instances may occur which seem to point out that a note should be thus influenced—as, for example, where a note which concludes a bar has been altered, and the next bar begins with a note of the same name—the repetition of the sign will effectually remove all doubt.

THOSE who believe that the annual publication called the "Musical Directory" is the only one of the kind ever issued will be surprised to hear that we have now before us the "Musical Directory for the year 1794;" and to prove that it is valuable, at least from its rarity, we may mention that the only other known copy of the work is in the library of the Sacred Harmonic Society. Apart from its scarcity, however, the book has much interest to the musical antiquarian, for an accurate reflection of the state of the art at the time it was published is presented by glancing at the various branches of music professed by those whose names are in the list. For example, nearly all the ladies are singers, although a few perform on the organ, fewer still on the pianoforte, and there is one violin-player—a Madame Hartog, who lived at "12, Leadenhall Street." Most of the males profess orchestral instruments, or the organ; but it is a rarity to find a teacher either of the pianoforte or harpsichord. Amongst the "Instrument makers" we light upon the firm of "Shudi and Broadwood, Great Pultney Street, Golden Square." The names of many eminent musicians then resident in London of course occur in the list—Joah Bates, Dr. Burney, J. P. Salomon, Signora Storace, Joseph Mazzinghi, for instance—but the one which arrests our attention more than any other is "Haydn, Dr. Joseph, Composer, Pia Forte, Prof. Con., Oper., Sol. Con., No. 18, Gt. Pultney Street, Golden Square," the explanation of the abbreviations being (according to the book) "Professional Concert, Opera, Solomon's Concerts," the last of which, no doubt, should be read "Salomon's Concerts."

Our Scottish friends are usually credited with, among other forms of caution, that which consists in refraining from risky experiments. Sometimes, however, they are caught napping, as at Glasgow recently, where Dr. von Bülow has been persuading them into a variety of practices strange and singular to their nature. The Choral Union Concerts of 1877 in the commercial metropolis of the Land o' Cakes will be memorable for sensational features, and especially will it be told in future years how the programme of the final entertainment was determined by popular vote. At the Doctor's instigation, a list of all the works performed during the season was laid before the audience of the last concert but one, and a selection invited from each person, the understanding being that those pieces should be reperformed which met with the greatest favour. We cannot congratulate the Glaswegians on the result, for a more commonplace and unsatisfactory programme than the one so indicated could hardly be conceived. We do not know precisely what works were in the list, but the following came out with all the blushing honours of public approval thick upon them: the "Tannhäuser" Overture (279 votes); the Overture to "Guillaume Tell" (213); Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" (131); a "Fantasia on Scottish Airs," by Moscheles (126); the last movement of Haydn's "Farewell Symphony" (118); Mozart's "Musical Joke" (117); Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasia" (105); the Overture to "Die Zauberflöte" (100); a Duet for Two Pianos by Saint-Saëns (95); Foster's Overture to "Rob Roy" (94); and the Overture to "Zampa" (95). Although such a selection is no more than might have been expected at the close of a sensational season, it is scarcely credible that Dr. von Bülow and his committee accepted the vote in good faith, and carried out the behest of their patrons. But we hope they will not do it again. There are some ventures allowable enough as experiments which scarcely admit of repetition, and this is of them. The public must not be permitted to write themselves down what—at Glasgow—they seem to be. No, no; appearances, at any rate, should be kept up.

The varying fortune of Handel's music among our French neighbours cannot but be a matter of interest in this country, if only for the reason that soberness and science will tend to modify their taste precisely where modification is most needed. A few years ago the cause of Handel was championed in Paris by M. Lamoureux, and several of the master's works, among them the "Messiah" and "Judas Maccabæus," were performed in what is now known as the Cirque d'Eté, with our own Madame Patey as chief contralto. Eventually M. Lamoureux abandoned the enterprise, which has now been taken up by M. Pasdeloup at the Cirque d'Hiver. Some of the Parisian critics cannot believe that Handel's new entrepreneur is in real earnest, because he performs also the music of Richard Wagner, the ne plus ultrâ of good in which is, says one, the disappearance of its key. But this sort of criticism is not for us. Enough that M. Pasdeloup produced the "Ode to St. Cecilia's Day" on the 6th ult., in presence of a great crowd, and that the work was well received, an Air and Chorus being encored. The Menestrel is good enough to say of the songs that they are not without interest in right of their archaic and retrospective character, but reserves its main admiration for the Choruses, "in which the voices, admirably disposed, produce most striking effects of grandeur and power." In this opinion the other musical journals agree, a fact not without significance as regards the advance of French taste towards the reception of music in its highest and, at the same time, severest forms.

Mr. Isaac Binns (from whom we have received an irascible letter respecting our remarks in the last number of the Musical Times on his lecture at Batley) should have opened the floodgates of his wrath upon the newspaper which has given so garbled a version of what he really did say. We hold ourselves perfectly responsible for the justice of our comments upon the account of the lecture which was forwarded to us, but not for the accuracy of the report itself. Had Mr. Binns, however, confined himself to a simple statement of facts we would willingly (as is our invariable custom) have given insertion to his communication; but he has prevented the possibility of our doing so by allowing his letter to degenerate into a personal attack upon the editor, whom, curiously enough, amongst a few other mental shortcomings, he accuses of "ignorance of natural history."

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

The Festival of the Conversion of St. Paul was celebrated in the Metropolitan Cathedral on Friday the 25th ult., in the mode which, happily, has become usual, and with greater success, from a musical point of view, than ever. Our readers well know the chief features of the special service which marks these occasions. They have read again and again of the surpliced choir some 400 strong; of the full orchestra, also surpliced, that obeys the baton of Dr. Stainer; and of the long selection from Mendelssohn's first Oratorio which does duty as an Anthem. Enough, as to these things, that none were wanting at the grand festival of which we speak, the arrangements being in all respects more efficient, if anything, than heretofore, while the increasing interest taken in St. Paul's Day at St. Paul's Cathedral was proved by a congregation that literally filled every available part of the huge edifice. The musical critic has, in strict truth, little to do with these magnified acts of worship. If he be a musician, as he ought, he must rejoice to see the Church, of old the repository and guardian of art and science, once more setting before her children in the fullest manner that which is noble and refined. But, after all, a solemn act of worship is not an exhibition, nor can it be decent for one man to find fault with the mode in which another approaches the Divinity. We decline therefore to deal with the service of the 25th from a critical point of view. Enough if we act the part of an historian, simply premising that no musical function in the Reformed Church of England was ever more worthy of its high object, or more satisfactory to those who think that what is done to the praise and glory of God should be the very best within the power of the doer.

The form of prayer, &c. was the ordinary evening service of the Church, and, as there was no sermon, the special features were entirely musical. It is with these that we have solely to deal, and they began with a series of organ voluntaries, ably played by Mr. Martin, Assistant Organist of the Cathedral, while the orchestra, choir, and clergy were taking their seats. The voluntaries were followed by the Overture to "St Paul," performed under the direction of Dr. Stainer, who, in surplice and hood, occupied a conspicuous position eastward of the lectern. The effect of the full orchestra, without the organ, was admirable, the acoustic qualities of the building allowing every detail to be heard, while the force of the combined sounds was not great enough to admit of the ensemble being clouded by echos. So accustomed are we now to hear "all kinds of music" in church that it is hard to recall the time, not so long ago, when any other instrument than the organ was deemed little short of sacrilegious. Happily we have outlived that day, and have learned how to consecrate to purposes of worship all musical resources; at once bursting the bonds of unreasoning prejudice, and opening up to ourselves new sources of pleasure and profit. Some such thought as this must surely have been present to the congregation while Mendelssohn's fine Overture rang through the sacred edifice. The Service used on this occasion was one written by Mr. G. C. Martin for the Sion College Choral Union, and was given with orchestral as well as organ accompaniment. It calls upon all the art of modern musical expression for appropriate effect, and is distinguished by many passages of very high musical interest. Not a little in the setting of the Canticles reminds us of Mendelssohn, but there is no plagiarism, and the work, as a whole, deserves to rank among the best illustrations of the talent now commanded by our Church. The selection from "St. Paul," performed in the place usually assigned to the Anthem, began with the journey to Damascus, and comprised the whole scene of the Conversion, followed by the setting apart of Barnabas and Paul, the leave-taking at Ephesus, and the final ascriptions of praise and thanksgiving. In these portions of the Oratorio, as few need to be told, are some of its rarest gems, "Rise up, arise," "O God, have mercy," "O great is the depth," "Now we are ambassadors," "How lovely are the messengers," "Be thou faithful unto death," and others. All were worthily rendered; the soprano solos by Master Bannerman, those for tenor by Messrs. Kenningham and Walker, and for bass by Messrs. Winn, De Lacey, and Kempton. Special mention should be made of Messrs. Kenningham and Winn, whose singing was worthy of an occasion so important. That the congregation listened with reverence need not be said. They knew that the Oratorio music had been restored to them from the concert-room, for which it was not originally intended, and that they heard it under the conditions which alone could set forth all its beauty and significance—reasons enough for an effort to comprehend and enjoy, apart from any considerations of religious feeling. Dr. Stainer may be congratulated upon the happy result of his labours, and all who assisted him upon the way in which a noble and pious task was discharged.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

In the opening Concert of the new year, which took place on the 7th ult., Mdlle. Marie Krebs made her first appearance this season at the instrument with which her name has, from an early age, been associated. The lady pianist played with marked refinement and power of execution Bach's Italian Concerto for pianoforte alone; being also, in company with Madame Norman-Néruda and Signor Piatti, the exponent of Beethoven's Trio in B flat (Op. 97), a special favourite with the audience at these concerts, and indeed with amateurs generally. The performance, we need scarcely say, left nothing to be desired, unless it be to hear the work soon repeated at the hands of three such consummate artists. Signor Piatti's splendid tone and calm artistic style appeared to the fullest advantage in his rendering of a Sonata by Boccherini, and the applause which followed it again proved the high estimation in which this performer is held, if indeed such proof were needed. Mozart's String Quartett in A major (No. 5) also formed part of the evening's programme, the executants being Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. Ries, Straus, and Piatti.

The second evening concert of last month brought a welcome repetition of Cherubini's Quartett in D minor, for stringed instruments, referred to in our last notice, and with the same executants as on the previous occasion. Mdlle. Krebs, who was again the pianist, called forth a storm of applause by her characteristic rendering of a Gavotte with variations (A minor) by Rameau, a name which, though well known in the history of the art, figures but rarely now on our concert programmes. That interesting revivals of this kind are always gratefully received by the musical public was again clearly proved on the occasion in question. Mdlle. Krebs judiciously responded to the required encore by substituting a "Tambourin" from the same representative of the Old French school. The lady was also associated with MM. Straus, L. Ries Zerbini, and Piatti in Brahms's Quintett in F minor, and it follows almost as a matter of course that the work of the gifted German composer received an excellent interpretation, this being the third time of its performance at these concerts. Mr. Barton M'Guckin turned his sympathetic tenor voice to good account in a Romance by Benedict and two songs by Mendelssohn. On Monday the 21st ult. the programme was headed by an interesting novelty, the String Quartett of Signor Verdi, which in this, its original form, was heard for the first time on that occasion, it having previously, in the exercise of a somewhat questionable taste, been performed by a full orchestral complement of stringed instruments at one of the Crystal Palace Concerts. The energetic applause which, on the occasion of its performance at the Popular Concert referred to, was accorded to every movement of the Quartett sufficiently testified to appreciation on the part of a numerous audience. We confess to our inability to share in this enthusiasm. The work, though by no means deficient in pleasing melodious phrases, is but loosely held together in its component parts; there is a want of continuity of thought apparent in every movement, except perhaps in the Fuga of the Finale, in which the modern Italian maestro once more proves that he is not deficient in the knowledge of counterpoint. The Prestissimo, with its incidental solo for the violoncello, is full of sprightliness and animation, but is disturbed rather than diversified by the triviality of the melody assigned to the solo instrument. The otherwise interesting chamber work of the composer of "Aïda" was capitally played by Madame Norman-Néruda, MM. L. Ries, Straus, and Piatti. The remainder of the programme consisted of a Sonata by Handel (A major) for violin, exquisitely played by Madame Norman-Néruda; of Beethoven's Sonata in G major (Op. 29) for pianoforte, executed with his accustomed skill by Mr. Charles Hallé, who, in conjunction with Madame Néruda, concluded the evening's proceedings by a most enjoyable interpretation of Bach's Sonata in A major (No. 2) for pianoforte and violin. Mr. Santley's well-known vocal and declamatory powers were duly appreciated in Mr. Cowen's "Rainy day," and Schubert's "Erl-King." At the last evening of the month, on the 28th ult., Herr Ignaz Brüll, the eminent pianist and successful composer of opera, was to have made his first appearance. We must, however, defer a notice of the concert in question until our next number.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The English version of Adolphe Adam's Opera "Le Châlet," which was produced on Boxing night, served merely as an introduction to the children's ballet-pantomime, and attracted but little musical attention. Mdlle. Hélène Crosmond, however, who made her début on the occasion, displayed a bright and well-trained soprano voice, and seems but to require experience to make her way to a good position on the operatic stage. She is a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, and her success inspires us with hope that, should we ever establish a permanent national Opera in this country, our old national musical institution will be able to furnish us with vocalists. Mr. George Fox, also a pupil of the Academy, is a reliable and efficient baritone; and Mr. Power, of whom we had not previously heard, possesses an agreeable tenor voice, both artists being fully equal to the rendering of M. Adam's lively, but not very exacting, music. Flotow's three act Opera, "L'Ombra," on the 12th ult., commenced according to Mr. Mapleson's announcement, the English Opera season, and, although by no means equal to the composer's popular "Martha," the work contains some exceedingly pleasing and melodious music. First performed at the Opéra-Comique in Paris, about seven years ago, as an Opera without chorus, "L'Ombra" was received with such favour that a few choral pieces were afterwards added, although it is too evident that they have not the slightest connection with the original design. The plot, which turns upon the terror of a young girl at recognising, in the disguise of a sculptor, an officer whom she believed to have been shot, but who was saved by the connivance of a friend, is too slight to keep the attention alive for three acts; but the situations afford good opportunities for the exercise of the composer's talent, and of these Herr Flotow has in many places successfully availed himself. Amongst the best pieces may be mentioned the song of the Doctor, "When I mount my Cocotté," Gina's Air, "Hear my prayer" (encored); a Quartett, "Approach, your places take" (encored); Vespina's Song, "Oh! Scandal;" a Duet,

"What strange, what wondrous emotion," for Gina and Fabrice; and a Romance for Fabrice, "Gentle angel," which was deservedly redemanded. As a rule, the performance resembled a rehearsal; but many of the defects, due merely to a want of sufficient preparation, were skilfully covered by Mr. Weist Hill, who conducted. Mdlle. Bauermeister's Vespina, however, is an excellent performance, both vocally and histrionically; Miss Purdy, as Gina, is earnest and painstaking, although her voice lacks power; the Doctor of Mr. George Fox has very many points meriting the warmest praise; and Mr. Talbo displays a good voice and style in the Romance we have alluded to. The English translation, called "The Phantom," is by Mr. Gilbert A'Beckett. Since the commencement of the season there has been no want of variety in the bills, for "Maritana," "Il Trovatore" (in which Miss Anna Eyre achieved a decisive, but we fear not a lasting, success as the heroine), "Faust," and other equally well-worn Operas have been already given, although scarcely with casts sufficiently strong to attract large audiences. It is understood that the English Opera season will be of brief duration, for the establishment will open for Italian Opera at an unusually early period. During the short recess the house is to be redecorated, and, amongst other improvements, additional staircases are to be constructed for facilitating access to both the pit tier and the grand tier.

ASKE'S SCHOOL FOR GIRLS, HATCHAM.

An unavoidable accident in the transmission of the following report prevented its publication in our last number; but the growing importance of the above school, and the fact of Professor Macfarren addressing the students on the occasion of the first award of musical scholarships, induce us to believe that a full account of the meeting—which took place in the hall of the school on the 8th December—will prove highly interesting to all who desire to promote healthful musical education in this country. The success of the establishment, which has been founded scarcely two years, is mainly due to the character and ability of the head mistress (Miss Connolly) and the teachers under her, and to the loyalty and energy they have inspired in their pupils. One of the special characteristics of this school is its carefully organised musical department, under Miss Macirone and an able staff of assistant professors; and the high position it has attained is borne out by the circumstance of the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music coming especially to examine the music pupils and award the scholarships for the ensuing year.

Professor Macfarren was introduced to the company by a few words from the head mistress, and addressed his audience nearly as follows:—

"Ladies and Gentlemen,—Give me leave to say a few words to you on the subject of the beautiful art it is the happiness of my life to cultivate. Let one of these words be Love and another Duty. Love is not a compelled duty, but the magnetism of the mind; and to the subject we love we owe the duty of advancing it to the utmost. Love will give heart and life, and promote the work; and Duty will shrink from no toil, and endure no imperfection. I have been shocked to hear music called an amusement. Music in olden times held a prominent place in England, and, if since then it has suffered neglect, it has of late years resumed its position, and has won the consideration of the greatest educational institutions of the country. Music at Cambridge has taken a far higher tone, the number of musical students has very greatly increased, and the qualifying tests are higher and higher. In Dublin the musical chair has risen to great respect, as well as at the London University and at Edinburgh. Thus the great institutions of our country, with the classical and scientific studies, give music a place in their official proceedings. Now it has been the habit to call England an unmusical country; and yet this is the only country in which University degrees are given to music. We have here Doctors and Bachelors of music, and this country is the only one which acknowledges music amongst the scholastic faculties. Let this, therefore, bear me out when I say that the study of music is not an amusement.

"Music is to be distinguished by the fact that our musical sounds are the result of the rhythmic movements of the air, and in the largest sense the old theory of the 'music of the spheres' is the application of this scientific fact to the movements of the planets of the universe; it is a product of the grand laws of rhythmic motion, which distinguish musical sounds in opposition to accidental ones, and attention to the rhythmical divisions of the notes is a matter of great importance.

"I think the pupils do high credit to their teachers, and, having recently been engaged in a long examination of other pupils, I find those of to-day show very great merit, especially in the Adagio of Beethoven's Sonata. This is a very songful piece for the piano, the chief melody requiring the effect to be produced like a song. Now it is a very high quality of playing to produce this singing character and give this expression. Every one excelled in the Adagio, and this shows musical feeling, which is highly worth the cultivation given to it here. All have not equal gifts, and in music the powers are very varied, but most rarely have I known persons totally without musical aptitude. I once knew a family utterly devoid of any power of perceiving musical sounds, but this was a most unusual case, and such persons might be called music deaf. Most people are able to appreciate music to some degree; and I am sure that cultivation may raise this power to a far higher standard than in its rude natural state. It is most dangerous to have bad teaching or to gain bad habits; thus these pupils are fortunate in having in the lady at the head of the music-school a distinguished musician in high esteem in our profession. The many proofs of her care and qualifications give great cause for confidence in her skill as a teacher and director of teachers. I think the institution fortunate in having secured her services, and I thank Miss Macirone, in the name of the profession, for the work she has done here in the cause of music, and for the care she has bestowed on the progress of the pupils of this school.

"I know the nervousness which necessarily attends the pupils at these examinations, and the vale of tears through which they sometimes pass; but I hope you will not consider me quite a tyrant. I know all the disadvantages of this position, and I wish I could have heard you play behind the door instead of in front of it. Let me assure you that you are doing well. You are engaged in a very high pursuit, and the quality of poetry, which is one of its chief elements, raises the mind to the divine source of all goodness and beauty. The heavenly fire is the principle of beauty, and whoever can perceive this principle becomes animated by a refining and purifying influence. If in your studies of painting or music you can perceive the beautiful, be certain it is the mainspring of greater happiness, elevation, and refinement, which in their turn will promote all intellectual advancement; and you will discover this beautiful art of music to be a very sound representative of the beautiful in other arts.

"Thoroughness must be your main desire, for superficiality leaves all noble work unaccomplished. What you undertake finish to the utmost. A piece of music should not be cast aside till made as perfect as possible. Let me remind you of this proverb, 'It is the first step which costs; it is the last that pays.' Learn all sides of the subject; learn the meaning of each piece of music, its technicalities, and perfect every note. To those who have great musical gifts I would say, cultivate your powers to the utmost, conscientiously using your talents as God's gifts. And I would not have the less favoured despair; they all, in a lesser degree, can be successful. I would only say it is very much to the credit of the whole school that in fifteen months' work so much should have been done, and I shall hope to hear how the work advances. We have here the beginning of such a sequel as will raise the character of the school, and the highest perceptions of those who are here.

"My vote of thanks is due to Miss Macirone for the great work she has done here, and to the music-teachers who are so ably seconding her; and I hope we shall see in the next examinations still higher progress. I entirely endorse the thanks to the teachers, which I feel thoroughly due. I will own that I am so many steps forwarder in the race, but excellence is in the reach of all who strive for it with perseverance and assiduity. We do not all want to go before the world to gain artistic distinction, but all the birds alike lift up their songs to heaven; though we only notice the lark and the nightingale, the sparrow and the robin as much send up their praise. Thanking the head mistress for kindly giving me the opportunity of saying these few words, I will only add, 'Everything will come to him that waits, and to him that works while he waits.' Work on, and success will be sure to accompany all your doings. [Loud and continued cheering.]"

The meeting concluded with a very enthusiastic and unanimous vote of thanks to Professor Macfarren for the honour and encouragement of his presence and his approbation of the work doing and done; and to the head music-mistress (Miss Macirone) and her assistant teachers, both of which were warmly received. After a few remarks by Mr. Cozens on the high and grateful appreciation, felt by parents as well as pupils, of the untiring zeal and ability of the head mistress (Miss Connolly), the crowded assemblage separated. The result of the examination was as follows:—

The Macfarren Scholarship.—Awarded to Emily Gilloch, pupil of Miss Read, R.A.M.

The Sterndale Bennett Scholarship.—To Gertrude Wiseman, pupil of Mrs. Baughan, R.A.M.

The Cipriani Potter Scholarship.—To Alice Wallis, pupil of Mrs. Thomas, Organist of St. Paul's, Deptford.

Mrs. Godding's Prize.—To Hetty Snellgrove, pupil of Miss Read, R.A.M.

It is with sincere regret that we record the death of Mr. Alfred Stone, Choirmaster of the Bristol Musical Festival Society, which occurred on the 3rd ult., at the age of thirty-seven. As a talented, conscientious, and earnest worker in the art for which in early life he evinced such exceptional powers, Mr. Stone held a high place in the estimation, not only of those resident in the locality which he so materially benefited by his valuable services, but of all those artists who from time to time were brought professionally into contact with him. When the idea of a Festival was first mooted in Bristol, and the question of a Conductor came before the Committee, Mr. Stone was unanimously elected; and we need scarcely say how thoroughly the result has justified this choice. As Conductor of the Orpheus Glee Society, too, and as Professor at several of the best educational institutions, he had won an enviable reputation for training the mind of those entrusted to his care to a love for and comprehension of the solid works in art; and it may truly be said that many a congregation sings with greater feeling and reverence because of his direct or indirect influence. In after years Mr. Stone's name will be best known to the general public as editor of the "Bristol Tune-Book," a work which has already had a marked effect upon the character of public worship both in England and the colonies. His unselfish and generous nature, which endeared him to all, both in public and private life, led him, we fear, to work beyond his powers of endurance; for, even when ill, it was only at the earnest intercession of his friends that he would absent himself from any professional engagements. The circumstance of his leaving a widow and ten children deepens the grief so universally felt at his loss; and at a large and influential meeting, under the presidency of the Mayor of Bristol, it was resolved, as the most suitable memorial of respect for the deceased, to open a subscription to be applied for the benefit of his widow and family. An advertisement in our present number will furnish every information as to where subscriptions to this fund are to be forwarded, and we earnestly hope that a liberal response will be made to an appeal so genuinely spontaneous in feeling and so truly benevolent in its object. We understand that up to the present time the subscriptions amount to upwards of £1,500.

The Borough of Hackney Choral Association gave the second Concert of the present season at the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on the 14th ult., before an audience filling every part of the room. The principal item in the programme was Weber's "Jubilee Cantata," with the words translated by the Rev. J. Troutbeck for the edition recently published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. The work was performed at the Gloucester Festival of 1874, but has never been heard in London since it was given at the Argyll Rooms on the occasion of the composer's concert in 1826. As might be expected under so able and zealous a Conductor as Mr. Ebenezer Prout, evidence of the careful manner in which the composition had been prepared was apparent in every department of the choir, the altos especially proving, as at the first concert, the rich and sympathetic quality of their tone, and the sopranos singing with remarkable brightness, giving out a clear and ringing C in alt in the choral portion of the Quartett and Chorus, "Wreathe into garlands," which, apart from the beauty of the piece, may have had some effect in creating an enthusiastic call for an encore, a demand, however, we are happy to say, not complied with. The principal singers in the Cantata were Misses Mary Davies and Martha Harries, Messrs. Sidney Tower and E. Wharton, all of whom were thoroughly efficient in the music allotted to them. A selection from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music commenced the second part, the "Shepherds' Chorus" in which was charmingly sung; and Sterndale Bennett's Trio, "The hawthorn in the glade" (from the "May Queen") Pearsall's Part-song "In dulci jubilo," and Auber's Overture "La Sirène" (finely played by the band) completed one of the very best concerts yet given by the Society. We are glad to say that the Shoreditch authorities have gracefully acknowledged the increasing success of these concerts by building a commodious orchestra, which, in addition to securing the comfort of the members of the band, materially improves the appearance of the room.

The following is the result of the public examinations held at Trinity College, London, on the 10th and 11th ult. Licentiates in Music—E. E. Carrington, Trinity College, London; John H. Gower, Mus. Bac., New Inn Hall, Oxford, and Trent College, Nottingham; W. H. Holloway, Trinity College, Manchester Branch; E. W. Taylor, Mus. Bac., New College, Oxford, and St. Mary's Stafford; Samuel Weekes, Mus. Bac., St. John's College, Cambridge, and of Plymouth; Charles R. Wilson, Gilford, co. Down. Associates in Music—James Gaskell, Wigan; Thomas Lee, Manchester; W. H. Oates, Manchester; Walter H. Palmer, Weston-super-Mare; Henry Peel, Trinity College, Manchester Branch; H. W. Rogers, Walsall. Students in Music—A. Carter, Shrewsbury; J. E. Carter, Shrewsbury; Horton Corbett, London; H. Deakin, Stafford; W. C. Everett, Colchester; A. J. Gosden, Wellesbourne; J. R. Hayward, Reading; J. E. Jones, Shrewsbury; T. H. Pegg, Manchester; W. C. Valentine, London; A. Widdows, London. Student in Arts—F. Miller, Trinity College. Higher Examinations for Women — Harmony: Second Class, Miss Louise Dickes, Tunbridge Wells. Counterpoint: First Class, Miss Frances Elliott, Staines; Second Class, Miss Jessie Armstrong, Holloway, N. Pianoforte: First Class, Miss Mary J. Bonham, Northampton; Miss Louise Dickes, Tunbridge Wells; Second Class, Mrs. Bishop, Shanklin. General Musical Knowledge: Second Class, Miss Louise Dickes, Tunbridge Wells; Miss Frances Ferraby, Midhurst. Vocal: First Class, Miss Kate Fusselli, London. Principal Examiners: Sir John Goss, Mus. Doc.; Edwin M. Lott, Charles Steggall, Mus. Doc.; Charles Edward Stephens, Edward Silas, Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac.; J. Stedman, Bradbury Turner, Mus. Bac. Branch Superintendents: Manchester, J. Kendrick Pyne, Organist of Manchester Cathedral, and J. M. Bentley, Mus. Bac.; Dublin, T. R. Jozé, Mus. Doc.; Shrewsbury, S. Corbett, Mus. Bac. The total number of candidates was forty-eight, of whom twelve entered for the higher examinations for women.

The decision of the Bishop of Worcester on the matters submitted to him mutually by the Dean and Chapter of Worcester and the standing Committee of the Worcester Triennial Festivals, has now been made public. He directs that a certain form of service, consisting of a few collects and pieces, shall be used daily before and after the Oratorio. With regard to the most important point on which the Festival Committee and the Chapter differed, i.e. the admission of the public to the Cathedral, the Bishop determines that admission shall be by cards obtainable from the secretaries or agents of the Festival Committee, who will issue them to subscribers to the fund for defraying the expenses of the Festival. The list of subscriptions to this fund is to be kept open until the time fixed for the commencement of the service, so that "subscribers" can obtain their "cards of admission" at any time on paying an adequate "subscription." The seats are all to be numbered, and the cards will be numbered also. If the Dean and Chapter contribute, as they proposed, £500 to the fund, they are to have a corresponding number of cards of admission. The whole available space in the nave, aisles, and transepts is to be reserved for the use of subscribers, and the choir and its aisles are to be placed at the disposal of the Dean and Chapter for the admission of a limited number of persons at their discretion.

AT the meeting of the Musical Association on the 7th ult., Dr. Stainer presiding, Mr. J. Spencer Curwen read a paper on the Laws of Musical Expression, with special reference to a recent work by M. Lussy, of Paris. The question was whether the variations in force and speed which every good executant employs are founded on rules which may prove useful to beginners, and to those whose musical feeling needs cultivating. Mr. Curwen maintained that there are general principles of expression which all artists observe, and that more attention should be devoted in pianoforte teaching to the structure of compositions, as regards their sections, phrases, modulations, &c. This would produce more intelligent and sympathetic players. In the discussion which followed, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Rev. T. Helmore, Dr. Bridge, Mr. C. E. Stephens, and the chairman took part. The general opinion was that it is hopeless to lay down rules for what is so much a matter of taste, but that the systematic study of expression was of the highest importance. Votes of thanks to Mr. Curwen for his paper, and to Mrs. Curwen for her performance of the illustrations, concluded the meeting.

MISS SAIDIE SINGLETON gave her first Evening Concert at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on the 9th ult., before a numerous and highly appreciative audience. The bénéficiaire, who is rapidly making a name before the public, sang with much refinement and artistic feeling a sacred composition by Signor Randegger; a song, "Oh buy my flowers," by Guernsey; and took part, with Mrs. Irene Ware, in Balfe's Duet, "Trust her not," in Randegger's Trio, "I Naviganti," with Messrs. Sauvage and Wadmore, and in F. Paer's Quartett, "O notte soave," in which she was associated with Miss Annie Butterworth and the gentlemen just named. In all these pieces she was received with marked favour, and created an impression which justifies the highest hopes for the future. Mrs. Irene Ware, Mr. Stedman, and Mr. Wadmore were most effective in all their songs; Mr. F. Chatterton's harp performance was extremely successful; and Herr Willem Coenen played Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsody" on the pianoforte, and a piece for the left hand only, both of which were warmly and deservedly applauded. Signor Randegger accompanied with his usual skill and judgment.

THE St. John's (Great Marlborough Street) Choirboys' Play was given in the Lecture Room on the 24th ult. It began with the comic Drama called "Look before you leap," in which Messrs. Lee, Bishop, Ward, Hunt, and Turner acquitted themselves satisfactorily. This was followed by the Comedietta "The Count and the Secretary." C. R. Ward gave an animated and dashing representation of the Count de Melcy, and W. G. Bishop was an impassioned and sprightly Pierre, while the Innkeeper, the Tailor, and the Postilion had efficient representatives in Messrs. Cook, Hunt, and Kirwan. The play showed a marked improvement on that of last year, and evinced much careful training of the boys, as well as discrimination in allotting the various characters. The dresses and appointments were of the best kind. There was a large and influential audience, who bestowed frequent applause upon the performers.

THE Annual Ballad Concert for the benefit of Mr. George Watts, the well-known entrepreneur, will be given in the Dome, Brighton, on Tuesday the 5th inst., under distinguished patronage. The programme is a most attractive one, and the list of artists exceptionally strong, including the Misses Robertson, Mdlle. Neunam, Miss Ellen de Fonblanque, and Madame Antoinette Sterling; Messrs. Henry Guy, Walter Bolton, and Wadmore; Madame Norman-Néruda, Mr. Charles Hallé; the Brighton Philharmonic Choir. Conductors, Signor Randegger and Mr. F. Kingsbury. From the high estimation in which Mr. Watts is held by the Brighton musical public, we expect that a large gathering will assemble to do honour to one whose successful endeavours to provide high-class entertainments deserve substantial recognition.

MR. CARL ROSA announces a season of Opera, commencing on Monday the 11th inst., at the Adelphi Theatre. The principal vocalists are Miss Julia Gaylord, Mdlle. Marie Fechter (of the Opéra-Comique, Paris, her first appearance in England), Miss Georgina Burns (her first appearance in London), Miss Cora Stuart, Miss Josephine Yorke, Miss Clara Merivale (her first appearance in London), Mrs. Aynsley Cook, and Madame Blanche Cole; Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. J. W. Turner, Mr. Charles Lyall, Mr. Ludwig, Mr. Snazelle, Mr. F. H. Celli, Mr. H. W. Dodd, Mr. Aynsley Cook, and Mr. Fred. C. Packard. Mr. Carl Rosa will, as usual, conduct, and Mr. Carrodus will retain his post as leader of the orchestra. The season will be opened with Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," and at a later period Mr. Rosa promises Ignaz Brüll's Opera "The Golden Cross" and a dramatised version of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen."

THE Royal Society of Musicians of Great Britain, instituted in 1738 for the maintenance of aged and indigent musicians, their widows and orphans, at the last monthly meeting of its members apportioned a sum exceeding £400 to relieve the wants of distressed members of the musical profession and their families, and nearly a fourth of that amount was granted to non-members and those who had no legal claim on its funds. This noble Society will hold its 140th Anniversary Festival and Dinner on the 3rd of May, when the Right Hon. Sir Alex. J. E. Cockburn, Lord Chief Justice of England, will preside; and it is to be hoped that all who derive either pleasure or profit from the art of music will contribute liberally in aid of the funds of a charitable Association which does its work so thoroughly and so unostentatiously.

THE concerts of the Philharmonic Society are announced to commence at St. James's Hall on the 14th inst. The instrumental portion of the programmes of the four concerts before Easter are given, but no detailed prospectus has been issued. A pianist new to this country, M. Plantè, will perform one of Beethoven's Concertos at the third concert, but no novelties are mentioned. For the lovers of the standard works, however, the selections at each concert will present a strong attraction; and those who cling to the time-honoured traditions of the Society will be glad to find that the hour of commencement has been restored to eight o'clock, and that the morning concerts will be discontinued.

THE seventy-first monthly Concert of the Grosvenor Choral Society was held at the Grosvenor Hall on Friday the 18th ult., the principal feature being "The Rose of Salency," an Operetta written and composed by W. Chalmers Masters. The work was well performed, the band and chorus numbering about 110 performers. The soloists, Mrs. Stamp, Miss Kate Reed, Mr. A. Lawrence Fryer, Mr. W. Powell, and Mr. Henry Baker, were very successful in their respective parts. The miscellaneous portion of the programme included Part-songs and vocal solos; and the instrumental pieces were Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" and Mêhul's Overture "La Chasse du Jeune Henri," well played by the band. Mr. J. G. Callcott conducted.

A PORTION of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio" has been given at St. Anne's Church, Soho, on Friday evenings, December 28, and the 4th, 11th, and 18th ult. The solos were taken by Miss Amy Gill (contralto), Mr. C. Wade (tenor), and Mr. Grieve (bass); and Mr. J. M. Coward presided at the organ. On each evening Tours's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F have been given. The services were opened with Gounod's "Bethlehem," Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus" being sung after the Oratorio. The orchestra consisted of seventeen performers, the whole being under the direction of Mr. Barnby. The services have been attended by large congregations.

A CONCERT took place at the St. Peter's Schools, Great Windmill Street, on the 24th ult., in aid of the Piano Fund. Misses A. Fripp, J. Hill, E. Blackwell, A. Blackwell, Maude Woodcock, Mdlle. Rudersdorff, and Messrs. Rendell and Froome were all very successful in a popular selection of songs and duets, and some part-music by Messrs. Humm, Rendell, Dorey, and Froome was well received. A piano solo by Miss Brown, and a concertina solo by Mr. W. Dorey, gave much satisfaction. Mr. A. Dorey (the Organist of St. Peter's) played the accompaniments throughout, and the room was well filled.

A BALLAD CONCERT was given at the Langham Hall on Thursday the 17th ult., in aid of a charity, under the able direction of Dr. J. W. Bernhardt. The vocalists were Miss Clara Perry, Miss Edith Blair, Miss Amy Bloxham, Mr. J. R. Jekyll, and Mr. Wilkinson; and, considering that many of these artists appeared for the first time before a public audience, their success was highly encouraging. Dr. Bernhardt relieved the singing by playing two pianoforte solos with good effect.

AT the recent examination at Cambridge, Mr. H. Fisher, a member of the Council of the Tonic Sol-fa College, graduated Mus. Doc., and Mr. Jenkins, also a member of the College, graduated Mus. Bac. Great efforts are now being made to collect money to build the College at Forest Gate, the demand for trained teachers of the system being greater than ever. The annual gathering of teachers and students of the system which has just been held in London was marked by much enthusiasm.

ON Thursday the 17th ult. the choirboys of St. Mary Boltons, West Brompton, presented their late Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. Horace Buttery, with a handsome photographic album, as a parting mark of their esteem and gratitude. At the same time they also presented Mr. M. Staunton, the late Librarian of the Choir (who resigned with Mr. Buttery), with an elegantly bound edition of Kingsley's works, in recognition of his kindness to them.

ON Thursday evening, the 3rd ult., after the choir practice, the choirboys of St. Paul's Church, Canonbury, presented Mr. Winbolt, the Organist and Choirmaster, with a handsome inkstand, in token of their gratitude to him for his kindness and the interest he had taken in them during the past year. Mr. Winbolt, in accepting the gift, expressed his thanks for the present made to him and the great pleasure he felt in receiving it.

THE Saturday Popular Organ Recitals at the Bow and Bromley Institute were resumed on the 19th ult., before a large audience. The season will extend to the end of April; and from the increasing attraction of these entertainments there is every reason to believe that they will become one of the permanent musical institutions of the eastern end of the metropolis.

MR. E. H. TURPIN, the Organist and Choirmaster of St. George's, Bloomsbury, was on the 6th ult. presented with a handsome gold watch by the members of his choir, who desired to testify their esteem and respect both for his professional merits and his social qualities.

AT the meeting of the Musical Association on the 4th inst., a paper will be read by the Rev. T. Helmore, M.A., "On a more Expeditious Mode of Writing the Time-notes in Music."

MESSRS. ARTHUR ALLISON and Co. announce that they have removed their pianoforte manufactory from Wardour Street to the Apollo Works, Kentish Town.

REVIEWS.

Parsifal. Ein Bühnenweih-Festspiel von Richard Wagner. [Mayence: B. Schott Söhne. London: Schott and Co.]

THE fact that the publication of the mere libretto—to use the familiar term—of an as yet incomplete music-drama should be regarded as an interesting event by a considerable portion of the musical public undoubtedly marks a new phase in the development of the music-drama itself. It was C. M. von Weber who some fifty years ago first advanced the then startling theory that the composer of Opera should be held responsible for his textbook also; and everyone knows how honestly and earnestly the composer of "Der Freischütz" and "Euryanthe" accepted the responsibility in his own case. Herr Wagner, however, has gone a step further. Conceiving the musical drama, at least in its ideal state, to involve the perfect blending of the two sister arts immediately concerned, he became, almost of necessity, both the poet and the composer of the remarkable operatic works which have been subjected to such severe and even invidious criticism, and which have, nevertheless, raised their author to the highest pinnacle of fame ever reached by an artist during his lifetime. We are not now concerned with the question whether, in the elaboration of these works, Herr Wagner has shown greater aptitude as a poet or as a musician—two qualifications rarely, if ever, combined in an equal degree in one person. His aim, like that of his predecessor C. M. von Weber, has been almost from the first a national one, and if the later stage works of Herr Wagner possessed no other merit than that of having, in a great measure, revived the study of the poetic masterpieces of the so-called first classical period of German literature, their importance would still be considerable. Both his "Lohengrin" and "Tristan und Isolde" are based upon the poetic productions emanating from that period of national greatness and healthy social life, while his more recent work of gigantic proportions—"Der Ring des Nibelungen"—is, in its main features, but a dramatised version of one of the grandest epic poems of all ages, of which every German is justly proud, though few probably have ever entirely read it. With "Parsifal," the textbook of which has just been given to the world, one more will be added to the number of national music-dramas from the apparently exhaustless pen of the German reformer of Opera. Whereas in his "Nibelungen" the author stands entirely on pagan ground, the new drama moves as exclusively in the sphere of the Christian legend, already foreshadowed in "Lohengrin." In the former work, founded as it is upon the tragic creations of Teutonic mythology, the sensual and spiritual elements are eternally at war; in "Parsifal" the spiritual predominates, and the strife finds its final solution in the Christian revelation. Thus, it may be inferred, Herr Wagner's latest dramatic work is essentially a religious one. It is based upon the originally British legend of Parcival (Peredur), one of the knights of the fabulous King Arthur, and subsequently knight-guardian of the "Holy Grail," so elaborately set forth by Wolfram von Eschenbach in his beautiful epic poem written about the end of the twelfth century. The ethical idea which pervades that poetic masterpiece is akin to that underlying Goethe's "Faust," the purpose of both poems being to depict the process of purification which the mind of man undergoes in his contact with the outer world, and to show how, passing through a series of doubts and errors, he will eventually obtain the truth, and with it a nobler sphere of existence. But whereas the twelfth century poet has found a perfect solution of this problem in the teachings of Christianity, he of the nineteenth, although pointing somewhat hazily in the same direction, really fails to find an equally complete solution, remaining himself a "seeker after truth" to the end of his life. In Herr Wagner's version of "Parsifal" this psychological tendency of the epic poem referred to has become the almost exclusive object of dramatic illustration. Discarding all allusions to his hero's adventures as one of the elect Knights of the Round Table, together with many other details in the description of which Wolfram von Eschenbach takes so much delight, he places the "Holy Grail" and its mysteries—i.e. the redeeming and purifying power of the Sacrifice offered by the Founder of Christianity—into the very centre of his drama, showing how the youthful adventurer is first brought under its divine influence, and how, after a period of trial and temptation, he is found worthy to become the guardian-king of the precious, life-preserving relic itself. The whole framework of the play is extremely simple; there is apparently but little of what may be called dramatic action in it, but a good deal to which an allegorical significance has to be attached; and, let us add, it will be almost impossible to appreciate either, as well as the subtle allusions in which the dialogue abounds, without some preliminary study of the subject upon which it is founded. This latter remark, however, applies more or less to all the later stage works of Herr Wagner, and we are not prepared to find fault with the fact.

The scene of "Parsifal" is laid partly in the Castle of Monsalvat, where the "Holy Grail" is being guarded, and its vicinity, "in the northern mountains of Gothic Spain," partly at the castle of the magician Klingsor, situate at the southern range of the same mountain chain. The following is a brief outline of the story enacted in these surroundings. Amfortas, the son of Titurel, has succeeded his father, who is still living, in the king-guardianship of the "Holy Grail"—the sacred vessel containing the blood which had flown from the crucified Saviour. It is a part of the royal prerogative to exhibit this sacred relic periodically before the assembled knights of the holy order, on which occasions the "Holy Grail" gives forth a magnificent light which exercises a divine influence over all, and none who have witnessed it can die within that week. It appears, however, that Amfortas being enticed into the precincts of the castle of Klingsor—the scheming magician, ambitious to obtain the "Holy Grail" and the power it wields—had fallen a victim to the sensuous attractions with which the latter surrounds his Court, and had been wounded with a spear wrung from his hands—the sacred weapon which had pierced the side of the Saviour, and which had hitherto formed part of the treasures connected with the "Grail." Conscious of having defiled the holy office which he held, the king returns to Monsalvat, but, although mortally wounded, he cannot die on account of the innate power of the mystery whose guardian he is, and which it is his duty weekly to display. At this juncture Parsifal enters upon the scene, a young adventurer whose father, Gamuret, a descendant of Titurel, had died in battle before the son was born, and who had been brought up by his mother in the solitude of forest life, kept in utter ignorance of worldly matters lest he should one day share the father's fate. The youthful hero had, however, torn himself away from these maternal leading-strings, and on his aimless wanderings had arrived at the seat of the holy mystery, "which none but the pure in heart can reach." He is conducted by one of the knight-guardians into the hall of the castle, where the holy rites are just being performed. Parsifal, greatly impressed by the scene, and still more by the sufferings exhibited by the king, remains throughout the ceremony, and afterwards, speechless, and his silence being construed by his guide into indifference, he is, after the assembled knights have left the hall, contemptuously told to quit the castle never to return. With characteristic naïveté the first act closes by the indignant knight in question violently closing the door after his youthful protégé, upon which the curtain drops. The following act introduces us to the luxuriant splendour of Klingsor's castle and its surroundings. After a somewhat lengthy dialogue between the magician and Kundry, a mysterious heathen woman—the only female character in the drama, and one surrounded with great interest by the dramatist—our hero again makes his appearance, resists the many temptations offered him, gains possession of the sacred spear, and as he breaks the spell around him the magician's seeming splendour disappears. With this the second act comes to a close. Between it and the third act several years must be imagined to have elapsed, years of wandering on the part of Parsifal in search of the "Holy Grail," during which time that inner process of purification must be supposed to have taken place which it does not lay within the power of the dramatist to depict. At last, however, the time arrives when the weary wanderer—the sacred spear, undefiled by him, in his hand; himself an altered, purified being—again reaches the doors of the long-desired Monsalvat. Again he is conducted into the grand hall, where the knights have assembled to mourn the death of their old king Titurel, whose coffin is being carried in and placed in the centre of the room. His son Amfortas, still suffering from his never-healing wound, is determined not to prolong his agony any longer, and, refusing to perform again the sacred rites which to him signify but a living death, exposes his bare breast to the warriors, imploring them to pierce it with their swords. At this moment Parsifal enters, and, extending the sacred spear to Amfortas, the old wound of the latter closes, and he is infused with new life. Parsifal, the sufferer, the redeemer, is hailed by all as the only one worthy to be the guardian-king of the "Grail." And as the holy vessel once more gives forth its glorious light the ancient Titurel, regaining life for the moment, raises himself in his coffin to bestow his blessing upon the assembly.

Our space does not permit us to offer more than this very faint and imperfect outline of the subject of Herr Wagner's latest drama. We abstain from all further criticism for the present, being content to await its final completion with all the wonderful musical effects and detailed stage accessories of which we know its author to be a consummate master. The work will no doubt become fruitful in controversy. Some portions will be objected to on orthodox religious grounds, while ohters will offer full scope to the pen of the satirist. But Herr Wagner has had to encounter similar antagonism upon the first appearance of nearly all his music-dramas, and he has grown old and famous in spite of it all. We will only add that the poem is written for the greater part in rhyme, the alliterative verse, so conspicuous in "Der Ring des Nibelungen," being but rarely made use of.

Album-Sonate. Für das Pianoforte. Von Richard Wagner. [Schott and Co.]

When we say that this piece was composed in 1853 it is almost unnecessary to add that it embodies not the ripened theories of one whose greatest boast is that he refuses allegiance to any code of rules save what may be evolved from his own conviction of the true mission of music in the world. By the term "Album-Sonate" (which perhaps may be a title given by the publisher) we are of course led to expect a composition not fully developed, or what we should perhaps term a "Sonatina;" and viewed in this light we are inclined to believe that the piece—which, although the time varies, is not divided into movements—will be played with much interest by musicians, and listened to with much pleasure even by a general audience. Commencing with a tranquil and expressive subject in A flat major, we are carried (somewhat abruptly) into C major, when a quiet and unpretentious melody appears. Some extremely good, but simple, writing afterwards occurs where fragments of the themes are treated, with a florid bass; and there are many effective changes of key, the calmness of the concluding portion of the piece, with the triplet accompaniment, being in excellent contrast with the energetic passages which precede it. No person hearing this unambitious trifle would believe that Herr Wagner is its composer; but everybody must feel that it is the holiday-work of an artist.

A Dictionary of Music and Musicians (A.D. 1450-1878). By eminent writers, English and Foreign. With illustrations and woodcuts. Edited by George Grove, D.C.L. [Macmillan and Co.]

To produce a reliable Biographical Dictionary of Musicians is by no means an easy task, but when to this is added an explanation of musical terms, with articles on the history of the art, on the science and practice of composition, and the nature and use of musical instruments, the difficulties accumulate to an extent which perhaps even the earnest and indefatigable editor of the work now before us has, in this early stage of his labours, scarcely yet fully realised. In his preface he says, "Every effort will be made to compress the articles as much as possible, consistent with their being intelligible and readable;" but herein, as it appears to us, lies a very sufficient reason why a Dictionary of Musicians and a Dictionary of Music should form separate works; for whilst the first should be a collection of interesting and well-digested biographies, the second should form a musical lexicon, the principal subjects in which should be treated of at length by the ablest authors. It is of course impossible to deliver judgment upon a single part of a work, considering that twelve quarterly parts—of about the same size, we presume—are found necessary to complete it; but, so far as we can pronounce upon the specimen before us, the plan laid down by the editor appears to be most satisfactorily followed out. A good staff of contributors has been secured; and, seeing that of necessity the space allowed them is perhaps unduly limited, they have ably and carefully performed the tasks allotted to them. As all the articles are signed, it would be invidious to mention any as particularly deserving of praise; but we may say, generally, that the subjects of most importance have been judiciously entrusted to those who have made them their special study, and that in all these cases much information is conveyed in a small compass, the explanations of the terms being often made additionally clear by musical illustrations. We know how exceedingly difficult it is to decide what to admit and what to reject in a Dictionary of this description, but can scarcely understand why, for example, Mdlle. Alboni should be mentioned, and not Mdlle. Albani; F. E. Bache, who is deceased, and not Edward Bache, now living; why also, as the word Academy is fully treated, the Royal Academy of Music should be omitted. As a matter of fact, too, we must mention that William Ball did not, as is asserted, write English words either to Spohr's "God, Thou art great" or to Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang;" but the English text was supplied to the first-named composition by Morley Chubb, and to the second by Mr. J. Alfred Novello, who, at the request of the Birmingham Festival stewards, journeyed to Leipzig to accomplish the adaptation in consultation with the composer, so that no time might be lost in preparing the work for the Festival then fast approaching. It is strange too, as the Dictionary bears the date of 1878, that Dr. S. S. Wesley should be spoken of as a living composer, considering that he died as far back as 1876. Then, as mere misprints, we would call attention to Michel von Asantschewsky, who is said to have been born in 1839, and to have become Director of the Conservatoire de Musique, at St. Petersburg, in the same year; to the invariable spelling of the word "obbligato" with one "b," and to the deriving the term "Acciaccatura" from "Acciacare," the correct spelling of the verb being with two "c's." Referring to page 41, where, in explaining the word "Agitato," mention is made of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne Worte," Book 1, No. 5, which is marked "Piano agitato," we may say that in the modern German edition it is altered to "Poco agitato." There can be no doubt that the original direction was a mistake, especially as the "p" for "piano" also appears. All the points we have mentioned (more important of course in a work especially designed as a reference for facts than in a mere gossiping book) may be easily revised in a reprint of the Part before us; and we are certain that, even if the editor do not agree with us as to the value of our suggestions, he will give us full credit for good intention in submitting them for his consideration.

Harmony. By John Stainer, M.A., Mus. Doc., Oxon. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS work forms one of the series of "Music Primers" issued by the above firm; and in his preface the author says that his aim has been the "collecting and explaining those facts universally accepted as the groundwork of harmony," rather than the putting forward "any special opinions he himself may have formed." The one exception to this rule—that of retaining the German system of naming intervals—he states that he has made "after much consideration," and this consideration we are bound to say is so apparent throughout the book that, although we may differ from the author on certain minor points, the obvious sincerity of his convictions makes us cordially welcome him as a worthy worker in the cause of musical progress. As a mere matter of opinion, we confess that we are not partial to the German system of naming intervals. It is good, we think, to call fourths, fifths, and octaves, perfect and imperfect; and it might be urged that, by using the words "tritone fourth" and "imperfect fifth" for those intervals which occur in the scale, all diatonic intervals would be major, minor, and perfect, and the terms "augmented" and "diminished" would be exclusively reserved for those intervals which are chromatically raised or lowered. We quite sympathise with Dr. Stainer in the desire to make his little book an introduction to works of a more elaborate character; and where the pupil is expressly told that he is not to rest content with the facts set forth in the Primer, but merely to provide himself with the materials for building, it is perhaps infinitely better to say too little than too much. One or two points, however (no doubt oversights), should be mentioned. At the commencement of chapter vii. it is said that "when the tonic of a common chord is not the lowest note in it the chord is said to be inverted." This word "tonic" (which we presume means "root") so often occurs when a common chord is spoken of that we are certain of the author's thanks for drawing attention to it; and we may also (whilst pointing out such small matters) refer to paragraph 52, where it is stated that the pupil need not bind himself to prepare his "minor sevenths," a direction which, of course, is intended to apply exclusively to "dominant sevenths."

In conclusion we cannot award too much praise to the logical manner in which Dr. Stainer has arranged the subjects upon which he treats. The exercises, it is almost needless to say, are excellent; and the plan of recapitulating the contents of each chapter by question and answer between master and pupils is well adapted to impress the characteristics of the various chords upon the memory. We are glad to find that the author asserts the impossibility of learning harmony without a master; but should any adventurous student attempt this task we do not know that we can recommend him a more satisfactory guide than Dr. Stainer's Treatise.

On Purity in Musical Art. By Anton Friedrich Justus Thibaut (Heidelberg, 1825); translated from the German by W. H. Gladstone. [John Murray.]

Speaking of this work, Schumann says, "Read it often as you grow older;" and that in Germany this advice has been extensively followed may be evidenced by the fact of the fifth edition of the book having appeared as recently as 1875. Let us hope that in England, where a love of true musical art is so rapidly gaining ground, the opinions of so learned and thoughtful a thinker upon the true mission of music in the world may, by the help of Mr. Gladstone's excellent translation, soon become as well known as in the land of the author's birth. The translator in his preface says that, "in choosing for his Essay the title of 'Purity in Musical Art,' Thibaut had in view not so much technical as moral purity. Music he considered not a mere study, nor a mere amusement, but rather as a moral agency." In furtherance of the desire rigidly to enforce this theory, it can scarcely be wondered at that he should seize upon the golden age of Church music as the period from the glory of which he believes we have gradually departed; that Palestrina should be placed at the head of the great sacred school; and that, even in speaking of Sebastian Bach, he should deplore the fact of his endeavouring to perfect his art "in the direction of florid part-writing," and to account his four-part chorales "unprofitable as regards the people at large, and most of our organists." His remarks upon the Chorale, and upon the gradual secularisation of Church music follow logically from his premisses, for he says that "Religious earnestness is wont to wax cooler as mechanical skill increases;" and although it is evident that a full admission of the truth of this maxim would keep us firmly to the traditional idiom of the style founded by the early Church writers, and thus bar the possibility of progress in sacred musical art, we cannot but respect the convictions of a writer who has so thoroughly thought out his subject and can so eloquently defend the principles he advocates. Passing on to the Oratorio—which, although our author does not expressly say so, he evidently considers the commencement of a departure from the true school—he dwells with enthusiasm upon the genius of Handel, and especially says that he never allowed his Oratorios to "travel away into Opera," although those who best know, and even reverence, this composer might assuredly cite instances where he has "allowed his Operas to travel away into Oratorio." We quite agree with the remarks upon the value of purely national melodies. The airs of the Troubadours, Minnesingers, and Meistersingers may be said to thoroughly reflect the spirit of the time in which they were sung; but we share with Thibaut the doubt as to whether any of these are preserved in all their integrity. The genuine tunes of a country which appear, as our author says, "to emanate from the people themselves, or are adopted by them and preserved as favourites, are, as a rule, pure and clear in character, like that of a child," and as few of these, fortunately, have been permitted to die out, every musician should possess and study them. Before reading the chapter "On the Use of Instruments," we had formed a tolerably clear notion of the manner in which the subject would be treated. "Had there been no sufficient reason," it is said,

"for excluding instruments from the Church, the great old masters, who worked with enthusiasm for the Church, would not have failed to avail themselves of them, but, in the main, they do not do so at all. It was not till the vocal music of the Church passed into the Oratorio style that accompaniments and interludes were thought of, and then the practice continued to spread—the more so as, eventually, even the operatic style was impressed into the service of edification." Now of course when, in illustration of this position, we are told to "imagine a congregation entering heaven with songs of praise, and introducing first timbrels and trumpets, and behind them a train of artillery" (alluding to the addition of cannon being discharged in the vicinity of a church) the abuse of instrumentation is alone alluded to; but that modern additions to a score—or what may be termed the legitimate use of instrumentation—come in for an equal share of the author's disfavour is proved by the observation that "Mozart, in spite of his marvellously fine taste, has, in this matter of accompaniments, forgotten himself as only his blind admirers can fail to see." In the "Messiah," he says, "Every page shows such overloading and interpolating as would unquestionably have been repudiated as misplaced by the great author of that immortal work." And then he alludes, curiously enough, to his treatment of the bass air, "The people that walked in darkness," a piece which, in our opinion—and we believe in that of most musicians—exhibits, more than any other, the deepest reverence for the design of Handel. We have the result of much profound thought in the remarks upon the misadaptations of texts, and also upon the proper method of conducting Choral Societies; but, as might be anticipated, Opera comes in for scarcely a good word: "It is no better," it is said, "than a feather in the eddy of a whirlwind." Well, in spite of Thibaut, Opera marches on, and every form of musical art shapes itself to the feeling of the time. That such books, however, as the one under notice may occasionally appear to help us into the right path should be the wish of every student who does not display, as our author says, that "arrogance that disdains all history."

The Musical Directory, Annual, and Almanack for 1878. The Professional Pocket-Book, or Daily and Hourly Engagement Diary for 1878. Published under the immediate direction of Sir Julius Benedict.
[Rudall, Carte and Co.]

The issue of the "Musical Directory" for the present year appears most carefully edited, and we quite sympathise with the proprietors when they assert that, after giving due consideration to the numerous letters offering suggestions, they have abandoned the idea of endeavouring to please everybody, and adopted what seemed to them most likely to be acceptable to the general public. It is obviously, for instance, impossible to keep out of the Directory "the names of those teachers who work for very low terms." A list of persons who practise music as a profession, with their addresses, is all that should be desired in a work of this kind; and if an editor were to endeavour to sort the competent from the incompetent, he would immeasurably exceed his duty. The "Pocket-Book" fully maintains its character, and as a record for professional engagements will be found invaluable.

Country Life. A Cantata; the words selected from the old poets; music composed by Edward F. Rimbault, LL.D. [J. Curwen and Sons.]

This work was found amongst the papers of the late Dr. Rimbault, and is now published in a cheap form, as one of the "Popular Cantatas in the staff notation" issued at the office chiefly identified with compositions in the sol-fa notation. Pastoral in character, and simple to the extreme in construction, the Cantata should find favour with all Choral Societies, and indeed with drawing-room amateurs who desire something that will give them but little trouble in preparation. The only fault that we find in it is that the "country life" it reflects is as unnatural as are the Dresden china shepherds and shepherdesses which sometimes adorn our rooms. It is too sunny, too suggestive of unalloyed happiness. Handel, in "Acis and Galatea," and Sterndale Bennett, in the "May Queen," have shown us how shadows can pass over these pastoral scenes, for the sake of dramatic effect; and, although all may be cleared up at the end, the interest of the auditor is thus kept alive. When we say that, after the Overture, in Dr. Rimbault's Cantata the titles of the pieces, in regular order, are "Now the bright morning star," "Hail! bounteous May," "May never was the month of love," "What pleasures have great princes," "Woodmen, shepherds, come away," "Summer, drest in lucid splendour," "Midsummer eve," "The Fairies' Revel," "Come, ye thankful people, come," &c., it will be seen that the work is of one colour throughout; and that, pleasingly bright as this colour is, a few dashes of a more sombre tint would be felt as a real relief. The music is, however, extremely pretty, and the harmonies conventional enough to delight a popular audience.

The Young Organist. A Collection of Pieces of Moderate Difficulty, transcribed for the Organ by W. J. Westbrook. Nos. 18-20. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Owing to the almost universal introduction of an "independent pedal organ" of more or less completeness in modern instruments, a demand has arisen for a different class of organ music to that formerly in vogue. Some years ago arrangements were usually made "for organ and piano," and even now some few of these hybrid publications make their appearance; but these are happily exceptional, and by far the greater part of organ music now published has a separate part printed for the pedals. Even an amateur organist would be ashamed to confess that he could not play from three staves. It must, however, be allowed that some of the best of modern organ arrangements are too difficult for any but first-rate performers. Either they are designed for such large instruments as are rarely to be met with, or they require an amount of execution, both with hands and feet, such as but few organists possess. Mr. Westbrook's arrangements are open to neither of these objections. He has written for ordinary players, and we find nothing in the three numbers before us that any good amateur organist could not manage easily. In his selection of pieces the editor has on the whole been happy. There are one or two for which we do not greatly care, but there are many more which are excellent. One special merit of the collection is the almost entire avoidance of "stock pieces." Of the fifteen movements (mostly short) contained in the three numbers, we meet with only one (Handel's "Holy, holy") which may be said to be hackneyed.

Novello's Octavo Anthems. No. 175. While the earth remaineth. Harvest Thanksgiving Anthem, by C. Swinnerton Heap, Mus. Doc.

No. 176. Out of the deep. Full Anthem by John Naylor, Mus. Doc.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

These two recent additions to the series of octavo anthems are both, in quite different styles, favourable specimens of modern Church music; and both show an amount of sound scholarship such as might reasonably be looked for (though, alas! it is not always to be found) from graduates in music. Dr. Heap's Anthem commences with a melodious phrase treated in free imitation, which is followed by a short Fugato on the words, "Therefore will we offer in His dwelling an oblation with great gladness," leading back to a recurrence of the first subject. A short unison phrase for tenors and basses, "Their offerings shall come up with acceptance upon mine altar, saith the Lord," then brings us to what may be called the finale of the Anthem—an introduction and short fugue, "The memorial of His abundant kindness," ending with a Coda which, with its sequence of suspensions, reminds us slightly of the close of the final chorus of "Elijah." The Anthem is pleasing, as well as musicianly throughout, and free from undue difficulty.

Dr. Naylor's Anthem is, as might be expected with a setting of the 130th Psalm, of a decidedly more sombre tone than the work just noticed. It opens with a somewhat developed fugue in B minor, excellently written. A very effective change to the relative major, pianissimo, occurs at the words, "If Thou, Lord, wilt be extreme." The succeeding modulations, especially that to E major at "In His word is my hope," are well conceived. A bright and rather short Chorus, in B major, "O Israel, trust in the Lord," concludes a very interesting composition. Though not very difficult, the last movement will require a little care, as amateurs are apt to be somewhat uncomfortable if they meet with double-sharps, and the modulations render necessary the introduction of several.

Carmen Etonense. Words by A. C. Ainger, M.A., Assistant Master at Eton. Music by Joseph Barnby, Precentor of Eton. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

There are few public schools which do not possess a "school song" of some description. An old foundation such as Winchester has its "Domum;" while modern institutions such as Marlborough and Haileybury have not been slow to perceive the power of music in strengthening the bond of union among the sons of a common mother. Eton, however, one of the most prominent of our public schools, has never had a song of her own, so that when some two years ago she enlisted the services of so distinguished a musician as Mr. Barnby, it was felt that the opportunity was not to be lost, and Etonians are now at length provided with a song which is fully worthy of the reputation of their school. Mr. Ainger, himself an old Etonian, has treated the orthodox subjects with much freshness and ingenuity. He has chosen a rhyming trochaic metre, excellently adapted for music; but, though his measure is a mediæval one, he has been careful to avoid the barbarisms in which his models abound, and there is scarcely an expression in his poem for which classical authority might not be adduced. The song consists of six verses and a chorus. The munificence of the royal founder, the studies of the place, the moral character and the combination of freedom with obedience to law which Eton endeavours to produce, and lastly the school games, are successively mentioned in vigorous Latinity; and the song ends with the usual aspiration for the permanence and prosperity of the school and its institutions. In setting these words to music a tune was needed which should be at once popular and solid; which, under necessarily varying conditions of performance, should never sound vulgar or trivial; which should catch the ear of a boy, and at the same time educate his taste. These requirements Mr. Barnby has fulfilled by writing a broad and dignified melody in A minor, Tempo di Marcia, modulating into the major in the chorus with a very bright and jubilant effect. It is harmonised as a four-part song, but of course will admit of several other applications. There is a certain antique flavour about the harmonies of the opening bars which is no doubt intentional; and we would especially notice the stately movement of the bass throughout, and the powerful declamation of the words "Floreat Etona!"

She is coming down this way. Song. Composed by Rosetta O'Leary Vinning. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

This is a charmingly fresh and melodious song, demanding, like all Mrs. Vinning's compositions, a sympathetic pianist, as well as a vocalist, for its due rendering. The independent points in the accompaniment reveal the touch of a finished artist throughout, and the alteration of rhythm on the words which form the title of the song is extremely beautiful. Commercial purposes may prompt the transposition of the song to a lower key; but, artistically speaking, we are certain that all who have been accustomed to it in F will never reconcile themselves to the change of colour it will assume in D, which the title-page informs us is the key of "No 2."

Wishes. Song. Words by Sir Terlagh O'Brien (1593).
Dearest little Maiden. Song. Words by Heine; translated from the German by T. Case.
Composed by H. A. Harding, Mus. Bac., Oxon.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The first of these songs has a melody well adapted to the words; but the voice-part is overweighted by the accompaniment, for not only are semiquavers continued throughout, but the harmony is so constantly changing as to produce a feeling of restlessness in the listener. Some of these harmonies are by no means agreeable, too, as an instance of which we may cite the first half of the sixth bar, page 1, and we cannot say that we like the progression commencing with the last two bars of page 2, which appears to be rather an example of what may be than of what ought to be done. "Dearest little Maiden" is much more to our mind. The subject is extremely melodious; and although the plan of harmonising every note is still pursued, much more sympathy with the voice is shown than in the song just noticed. Heine's words have been very fairly translated by Mr. Case.

Holiday Symphony, for the Pianoforte, Violin, and Violoncello ad lib., and Toy Instruments. Composed by Edouard Marlois. [William Czerny.]

The composer of this little holiday trifle has well followed the model set by Haydn, and given us a bright, cheerful, and melodious piece, easy enough to be accomplished without effort by a juvenile orchestra. We think it a pity that he has not included a slow movement, for many excellent effects can be obtained with the toy instruments in a pathetic Andante. A good contrast, however, is gained by the Minuet, and the Finale is appropriately joyous and tuneful. The pianoforte part forwarded to us is arranged as a duet; but we see that it is also published as a solo.

Eight Characteristic Pieces for the Pianoforte. Composed by Franz Behr. [Witt and Co.]

The name of this composer is new to us, but there is a delicacy and refinement in his "Characteristic Pieces" submitted to us which makes us desire his further acquaintance. True they are not by any means equal in merit, nor do they aspire to be more than graceful trifles for juvenile fingers; but we see in them an indication of cultivated artistic feeling which will no doubt be shortly amply developed in works of greater importance. The very brief sketch, "Dreaming," derives much of its effect from the syncopated accompaniment, but the character of the piece well justifies its title. "Chimes" is scarcely so much to our liking; but the "Evening Song" and "Birdie's Message" are charming, the latter, if we must declare a preference, being our especial favourite. The "Bohemian Melody" and "Under the Linden-tree" may be passed with a word of commendation; but "May Lilies" and "Excursion" are extremely beautiful, the first, although the less pretentious of the two, being remarkable for its appropriate elegance and simplicity. We cordially commend these pieces to the attention of those who are entrusted with the training of young players.

Minuet in C; Sarabande in B flat; Gigue in G; for the Pianoforte. Composed by Michael Watson. [C. Jefferys.]

Mr. Watson has made himself quite a name for the composition of these old dances, for not only has he completely caught their rhythm and spirit, but he writes so well for the hands as to enable moderately advanced players to give effect to his music without undue labour. We see no reason for informing us that his Minuet is in the "antique style," for if the character of a composition does not declare itself, it is worth nothing; and the less an author has to say about his own works, therefore, the better. The bold diatonic harmonies in this piece, apart from its melodiousness, will make it generally acceptable. We especially like the change from C to F, but scarcely think that the portion in D flat fits in comfortably with the rest. The Sarabande is excellent, both melody and harmony being unexceptionable throughout. The character of the dance is remarkably well observed; and the passages of imitation prevent any effect of monotony. The Gigue, although not perhaps in a musical sense the best of the three pieces, may very probably obtain the greatest amount of popularity, for it is tuneful in the extreme, full of life, and although seemingly difficult, comparatively easy to play. Mr. Watson may safely multiply compositions of this character with every confidence of success, both with teachers and pupils.

The Conqueror's March, for the Pianoforte. By Charles H. Townsend. [Moutrie and Son.]

Experience has proved to us that when an amateur desires to throw a few tonic and dominant harmonies into the form of a composition, he almost invariably chooses a March. It is true that, as in the case of dance music, the rhythmical character of the piece will materially help to prop up weak writing; but it must be remembered that there are laws to regulate the progression of the simplest chords, and that, even in passing from the dominant to the tonic, musical ears may be offended. The "Conqueror's March" is so singular an instance of what may be termed "raw" composition that we should imagine Mr. Townsend has never taken a lesson in his life. To say nothing of the manner in which the several phrases are sewn in patches, the amicable walking together of two parts in octaves and fifths—as in bars 7 and 8, page 4—the doubling of leading notes, as in bar 8, page 6—and the false basses, as in bar 21, page 5—are so obtrusively disagreeable that we feel a sense of relief, when, on closing the piece, we become conscious that we shall never see it or hear it again. We cannot perhaps ask why such compositions are written and published, because we know that it is a gratification to an author to see his work in print; but we do ask, Why they are sent for review?

A Thought. Melody, for Piano; by Harry B. Lewis-Barned. [R. Mills and Sons.]

Mr. Lewis-Barned's "Thought" is scarcely spontaneous enough to justify the title of his piece, for it sounds too much like a pale reflection of Mendelssohn; but (if we except a somewhat awkward resolution of the dominant seventh on the first inversion of the key-note triad, nine bars from the end of page 3) both melody and harmony are throughout unexceptionable. Should the piece be reprinted the composer should look over the first bar of page 5, where in the bass a sharp is placed before the A instead of the C, and a C is printed in the next chord, in lieu of D. We know not whether this is the first published work of Mr. Barned, but, if so, it is extremely promising.

FOREIGN NOTES.

The present protracted period of stagnation of commerce, and consequent want of prosperity through which, in common with most other countries, Germany is just now passing, could not fail to make itself injuriously felt also in the sphere of artistic and theatrical enterprise. Thus we hear of several of the minor establishments appertaining to the latter category being obliged to close their doors, notably the Stadt Theater of Bremen and Görlitz, and the Carl Schultze Theater at Hamburg. For the same reason the projected foundation at Bayreuth of a model school of music, which was to have been inaugurated during the present year, will have to be adjourned beyond that period. Herr Wagner, in a letter directed to the "Society of Patrons" of his various undertakings, announces the fact to his faithful allies, and in addition expresses the hope that his new drama, "Parsifal," will be performed in the summer of 1880 at the Bayreuth Theater. On the other hand there is no lack of activity shown on the part of directors of such art-establishments as are either subsidised by the Government or sufficiently well supported by the public to be but little affected by existing unfavourable circumstances. Among the latter class the Stadt Theater of Hamburg has been for some time conspicuous for its enterprise in the production of new operatic works and the judicious revival of the old classics. Last month, on the occasion of the two-hundredth anniversary of its foundation, the institute in question marked the event by an "historic week of opera," the works selected for performance being "Venus und Adonis," by Keiser; "Almire," by Handel; "Der betrogene Cadi," by Gluck (on the first night); "Die Jagd," by Adam Hiller; "Apotheker und Doctor, by Dittersdorf (second night); "Adrian von Ostade," by Weigl; "Die Entrührung" by Mozart (third night); "Fidelio," by Beethoven (fourth night); "Der Holzdieb," by Marschner, and Weber's "Freischütz" (fifth night); and Wagner's "Lohengrin" (sixth night). At the same theatre are now in course of preparation the following new works by contemporary German composers: "Armin" (Hofman), "Golo" (Scholz), and "Die Walküre" (Wagner). At the Cassel Court Theater the interesting series of historic performances of opera, already referred to in our notes, still continues. A new comic opera entitled "Die Offiziere der Kaiserin" (The Officers of the Empress), by Richard Wuerst, which was to have been performed on the 21st ult., has been the only novelty during the month at the Imperial Opera at Berlin. Referring to this fact, Le Menestrel thinks the new work will form an apt pendant to Halévy's "Mousquetaires de la Reine," which has lately been revived at the Paris Opéra-Comique.

Under the title of Bayreuther Blätter a weekly journal is about to be started which will devote its pages especially to the cause of Herr Wagner. The paper will be edited by Hans von Wolzogen, the zealous supporter of the reformatory movement, Herr Brahms's new Symphony (No. 2) has lately been performed for the first time both at Vienna and Leipzig. The work was exceedingly well received, and is pronounced by connoisseurs to be superior to the composer's previous symphonic tone-picture.

Another important sale of autographs is to be held on the 26th inst. at Leipzig. The collection, one of the most interesting which has ever been brought under the hammer, will include the names of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Mozart. It had been originally in the possession of Consul Wagener, the same whose patriotic bequest of his valuable collection of paintings to the State laid the foundation of the Berlin National Gallery.

Franz Liszt is just now at Pesth, where he is devoting his whole time to the instruction on the pianoforte of some fifteen talented pupils, five of whom are natives of Hungary. The celebrated pianist and tone-poet will go to Weimar at Easter, and thence to Italy, returning to Pesth in the autumn. All invitations to perform at concerts he has positively declined.

Madame Annette Essipoff, the eminent pianiste, is at present giving concerts in the Prussian capital.

The first representation of Herr Wagner's "Walküre" took place at the Court Theater at Schwerin on the 7th ult. The work was, it is said, very well mounted and adequately performed, and was received with the greatest enthusiasm.

There is little doubt that the projected invasion en masse of the entire personnel of the orchestra of the Viennese Opera into Paris during the International Exhibition will become a reality, all the preliminary arrangements for the undertaking having already been made. A visit to London is likewise to be included in the scheme, and it is said that negociations have been entered into for six concerts to be given by the company of artists at the Crystal Palace.

The Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Zeitung draws attention to the fact that a son of Hummel, the composer of classical pianoforte music, has been for some years living at Wiesbaden, already advanced in years, disabled by illness, and in needy circumstances. A fund has been opened by the Wiesbadener Montags-Zeitung, in aid of this unfortunate descendant of a man of genius, whose compositions have long been a source of enjoyment to the student of the pianoforte.

The Imperial Opera at Vienna commenced a new series of performances on the 1st ult. The following are a few of the works comprised in the répertoire: Wagner's "Rheingold" and "Siegfried," Rubinstein's "Die Maccabäer," Gounod's "Cinq-Mars," Delibes' "La Source," and Halévy's "Fandango." Among the singers engaged are mentioned Mesdames Nilsson, Trebelli, and Salla, MM. Faure, Masini, Padilla, and Behrens. Herr Anton Rubinstein was expected at the end of last month at the Austrian capital for the purpose of personally conducting the rehearsals of his above-mentioned opera.

Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," with Mdlle. Krauss as Selika, was performed for the first time in the new Grand-Opéra House at Paris, on December 23. The carefully rehearsed work was most sumptuously put on the stage, the ship alone, which plays a part in the third act, having, it is said, involved an expense of 80,000 francs. The opera has been repeatedly performed since, M. Salomon singing the part of Vasco di Gama and M. Lasalle that of Nelusko. At the Théâtre-Italien Mdlle. Marie Durand has created a furore by her representation of the rôle of Aïda in Verdi's opera of the same name.

M. Gounod has left Paris for Milan in order to assist at the first representation of his opera "Cinq-Mars." The celebrated French composer will also be present on the occasion of the first performance of the same work at Naples, which is shortly to take place.

The publishing firm of Legouix at Paris has just issued a new edition of the opera "Castor et Pollux," by Rameau, the contemporary and (for a time) the rival of the great Gluck. Republications of standard works by old masters are, it appears, on the increase, and we notice the fact with all the more pleasure as enterprises of this kind are rarely undertaken unless it be with a view to supply a real want.

The following is a list of the gentlemen who will represent their respective countries in the musical section of the forthcoming Paris Exhibition: England, Dr. Arthur Sullivan; Italy, Signor Sighicelli; Austria, Dr. Ed. Hanslick; Belgium, Netherlands, Switzerland, and Luxembourg, M. Joseph Dupont; Spain, Portugal, and Greece, M. Avelino Valenti; Turkey, Egypt, China, Japan, &c., M. Oscar de Tunis; Sweden and Norway, Herr Ivar Hallstroem. Germany, it will be noticed, is conspicuous by its absence; Russia has not yet appointed her representative.

Flotow, the composer of "Martha," is expected in Paris, where his new opera, "La Rosellana," is shortly to be performed at the Théâtre-Italien. At the same establishment Mdlle. Albani made her reappearance in "Lucia" on the 15th ult., in order to become again the recipient of the flattering ovations offered her during last season.

An accident, which fortunately was not accompanied by very serious consequences, happened the other day to Mdlle. Carol of the Opéra-Comique. During a performance of "Zampa," in which she sang the rôle of Camille, the lady fell through a trap-door which the stage-machinist had opened too soon, and received several slight contusions. A few days' rest, it is hoped, will suffice to restore the health of the fair artiste.

The first volume of the supplement to M. Fétis' "Biographie Universelle des Musiciens," by M. Arthur Pougin, has just been published in Paris.

The cemetery where Franz Schubert was buried being about to be closed, it is proposed, on the part of the Viennese Männergesangverein, that the remains of the great composer should be exhumed and transferred to the new burying ground, where a monument is to be erected over the grave, the expenses of which are to be defrayed by the "Schubert-fund" of the Society mentioned.

We gather both from the Guide Musical and the Allgemein Handelsblad that M. Franz Rummel, the eminent pianist, who had recently taken part in a concert tournée organised by the impresario M. Strakosch in various towns of Holland, has been the recipient everywhere of most flattering signs of appreciation on the part of his audiences.

The January number of the Revista Europea, published at Florence, contains an interesting article headed "La Musica nel 1877," in which various subjects connected with the art are very ably touched upon.

We subjoin the programmes of concerts which have taken place during the past month at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Populaire (December 30): Symphonie fantastique (Berlioz); Pianoforte Concerto in E flat (Beethoven); Le Désert, Ode symphonique (David). Concert du Conservatoire (January 6): Symphony in G minor (Mozart); Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" (Lalo); Symphony in C minor (Beethoven). Concert Populaire (January 6): Ode to St. Cæcilia (Handel); Overture to "Fingal" (Mendelssohn). Concert du Châtelet (January 6): "La Damnation de Faust" (Berlioz). Concert Populaire (January 13): Symphony in C (Beethoven); Overture to "Manfred" (Schumann); Fragments from the "Seasons" (Haydn). Concert du Conservatoire (January 20): Symphony in G flat (Schumann); Fragment from "Orpheus" (Gluck); Symphony in C major (Beethoven). Concert Populaire (January 20): Symphony in G (Haydn); Music to "Egmont" (Beethoven); Overture to "Francs-Inges" (Berlioz).

Leipzig.—Concert of the Gewandhaus (January 1): Prayer of Martin Luther, for orchestra and chorus (Mendelssohn); Overture, Op. 124 (Beethoven); Motett (Chr. Bach); Concerto, played by the composer (Brahms).

Berlin.—Concert of the Symphonie-Kapelle (December 15): Dramatic Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" (Berlioz); Chorus from "Die Meistersinger" (Wagner); Violin Concerto (Bruch). Concert of the Sing-Akademie (January 11): Handel's Oratorio "Belshazzar." Concert of the Wagner Society (January 9): Third act from "Die Walküre" (Wagner).

The death is announced of Alberto Mazzucato, for many years Principal of the Milan Conservatoire, and editor of the excellent journal Gazetta Musicale di Milano. From an artistic point of view it will be difficult to fill the blank his death has created, and as a proof of his social popularity it is sufficient to mention that his remains were followed to the grave by between six and seven thousand persons. Eloquent funeral orations were delivered over the grave, amongst them one by Signor Giulio Ricordi, who, on behalf of Verdi as well as himself, dwelt at length upon the great and sterling qualities of the departed musician. Alberto Mazzucato was born at Udine on July 28, 1813, and died in Milan on December 31, 1877.

TALLIS AND HIS SONG OF FORTY PARTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—We have all heard of Tallis's "Song of Forty Parts," but have had hitherto no information, that I am aware of, as to the circumstances which led to its being composed. The little story which I have to tell will, I believe, throw some light upon the matter.

Some twenty and odd years ago, whilst examining certain manuscripts in the University Library at Cambridge, I chanced to light upon the Commonplace Book of a student of the Temple, Thomas Wateridge by name, whose habit it was to intersperse his legal memoranda with sundry anecdotes which he had heard related on different occasions, and noted down with much circumstantiality of time and place. Amongst these stories I found the following, told, he informs us, "by Ellis Swayne at my chamber ye 27 Novr. 1611, Mr. Gulson and Richard Grovesey beinge present."

"Of Pricke Songe.

"In Queen Elizabeth's time yere was a songe sen[t] into England of 30 parts (whence ye Italians obteyned ye name to be called ye Apices of ye world) wch beeinge songe mad[e] a heavenly Harmony. The Duke of —— bearinge a great love to Musicke asked whether none of our Englishmen could sett as good a songe, and Tallice beinge very skilfull was felt to try whether he would undertake ye Matter, wch he did and made one of 40 partes wch was songe in the longe gallery at Arundell house, wch so farre surpassed ye other that the Duke hearinge of yt songe, tooke his chayne of Gold from of his necke & putt yt about Tallice his necke and gave yt him (wch songe was againe songe at ye Princes coronation)."

I have given this story just as I found it, and see no reason to doubt its reality. "The Duke," patron of art, jealous for the musical honour of his country, impulsive in his generosity, was of course Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk, who was beheaded on June 2, 1572; and the action attributed to him is quite in keeping with his character as sketched by Camden, who says, "It is incredible how dearly he was loved by the people, whose goodwill he had gained by a princely munificence and extraordinary affability." But something more than his popularity must have emboldened the printers, immediately after his execution, to extol him in ballads, two of which have come down to us: the one "A dittie in the worthie praise of an high and mightie Prince," the other (by Elderton, "the ballad-monger," as he was called) "The Dekaye of the Duke." Those who, under Tudor sovereigns, suffered on the block for treason were not wont to have their "worthie praise" commemorated in song, if the printer had any regard for his personal safety. In fact, the Duke of Norfolk was the victim, not so much of the Queen (who recalled three out of the four warrants which she signed for his death) as of the powerful Puritan party, whose very preachers clamoured for his head, and under whose pressure the Commons petitioned the Crown for his execution, urging that there could be no safety until the Duke was dead. Then, after nearly five months' hesitation, she yielded. This hatred would seem unaccountable, in spite of his intrigues, seeing that the Duke had had Foxe for his tutor, and had been a staunch supporter of the Protestants, were it not clearly traceable to the influence of Leicester, their acknowledged leader, who could not endure so powerful and popular a rival, and through whose machinations the Duke's destruction was at last brought about. The date of his execution will help us a little towards ascertaining that of Tallis's composition. Queen Elizabeth came to the throne near the close of 1558, and the Duke was committed to the Tower in August 1569, during the former part of which year he was quite immersed in the intrigues which, for him, ended on the scaffold. So that the performance of the "Song of Forty Parts" must have taken place between 1559 and 1569, and probably nearer to the former than the latter year.

To what the writer of the story refers, when he says that this music was again sung at the Prince's coronation—supposing the words in parentheses to have been written at the same time as the rest—I do not quite know. He would hardly speak of James I., who was crowned on July 25, 1603, as "the Prince;" and Henry, Prince of Wales, does not appear to have taken part in any public ceremony, save that of his installation at Windsor as Knight of the Order of the Garter in the same year. But, if the words in parentheses were added afterwards, they refer no doubt to the coronation of Charles I. on Candlemas Day, 1626. And this seems to be borne out by the statement of Sir John Hawkins, who tells us of the composition in question that "in the reign of the first or second Charles some person put to it certain English words,* which are neither verse nor prose, nor even common sense, and it was probably sung on some public occasion."

The "Song of Thirty Parts" sent into England in Queen Elizabeth's time can hardly be other than the oft-quoted but hitherto undiscovered Motett in thirty-six parts, of J. Okenheim, the great Belgian contrapuntist, who died about 1515. To mention it as of Italian origin was a very pardonable error on the part of Mr. Ellis Swayne. We may remember that a full century after his day some music published in England was described as by "An eminent Italian master," with whose name we presently became more familiar as George Frederick Handel.

One other question remains: What has become of Tallis's composition? So far as I can gather, it has been lost sight of for nearly a hundred years. Dr. Burney, writing before 1789, says, "I have seen this effort of science and labour;" and, after describing it, adds, "After being in the possession of the Earl of Oxford,† it was attracted into the vortex of Dr. Pepusch; but is at present the property of Mr. Robert Bremner, Music-printer in the Strand."

On this and other points some of your readers may be able to throw more light than I have materials for acquiring in a remote country place. But even though the relation of the foregoing anecdote elicit nothing new to be added to our scanty information respecting Tallis, yet the picture of the greatest English musician of his time—the Master—in the heyday of his reputation conducting the performance of his own music in the gallery of Arundel House, and dignified with the ducal chain, as a token of the donor's admiration, is a pleasing one to dwell upon, not only as illustrating the estimation in which musical talent was held three centuries ago, but as representing perhaps the sole incident preserved to us in the life of one, whose history we know so little of, whose genius we venerate so greatly, and whose name is so indissolubly bound up with English Church music.

H. Fleetwood Sheppard.

Thurnscoe Rectory, January 17.

[Copies of Tallis's Forty-part Song are to be found in the libraries of the Queen, the British Museum, the Sacred Harmonic Society, and Sir Frederick Ouseley. A few years since it was performed by the old Madrigal Society, under the direction of the late Thomas Oliphant.—Ed. Musical Times.]

* He gives the original Latin words as follows: "Spem in alium nunquam habui præter in Te Deus Israel, qui irasceris et propitius eris, et omnia peccata hominum in tribulatione dimittis; Domine Deus creator cœli et terræ, respice humilitatem nostram."

† According to Hawkins it was presented to the Earl of Oxford by Mr. Hawkins, formerly Organist of Ely Cathedral.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Mr. Sheppard's letter has introduced a subject of much interest, and which I hope will be followed up by him and others. A collation oft he early Psalters is much to be desired, and I feel sure that not a few unsuspected relations between them would thus be brought to light. But such a work must be done with minute accuracy. Innumerable are the errors which have arisen from causes such as these: imperfect description of volume, superficial examination of contents, confusion of one edition with another, similarity of tunes mistaken for identity, and conjectural dates quoted as if they were established. If your correspondents can speak of a Psalter from personal knowledge of it, so much the better; but where statements are given at second-hand I hope that the authorities for them will be supplied.

Let me add a few notes to Mr. Sheppard's letter. The Anglo-Genevan Psalter of 1556, published for Knox's congregation at Geneva, is a book of great interest, as it was the direct ancestor of the Scottish Psalter. Livingston's reprint of the latter Psalter (Glasgow, 1864) contains copious prefaces which give the details of its history. The Anglo-Genevan Psalter of 1569 must have been much more than a second edition—several editions certainly intervened. This Psalter began with fifty-one psalms, and was afterwards increased until it contained all the psalms, and, I believe, fifty-two tunes. In a letter published in the Musical Standard, September 15, 1877, Professor Colin Brown, of Glasgow, speaking of this Psalter, says, "The old title-page must have been used for subsequent editions, for the one I saw contained the whole book of psalms, with the names of the writers to each." In the Anglo-Genevan Psalter first appeared Kethe's version of the Old Hundredth Psalm, "All people that on earth do dwell," but without music. The Psalter in St. Paul's Library is, I have been told, included in a volume of 1561, but is itself without a date. When Mr. Sheppard says that the first known appearance of the Old Hundredth Psalm-tune is in Utenhove's Psalter, I presume that he speaks with reference to England only. He is surely aware that the tune first appeared in Calvin's French-Genevan Psalter, and was one of the tunes added to the enlarged edition of 1554, where it is set to Psalm cxxxiv. It is not in the earlier editions. Full information respecting this very important Psalter will be found in Bovet's "Histoire du Psautier des églises reformées" (Neuchâtel, 1872).

But the "Old Hundredth" is not in the "Hondert Psalmen Davids" at all. That volume does contain two psalms (cxvi. and cxlvi.) which begin in a similar manner, but are otherwise quite different. And here I may remark that the first strain of the Old Hundredth tune is a commonplace of the period, and is found in several tunes of perfectly distinct origins. It has been doubted whether Daye's Psalter of 1562 ever existed, but a gentleman, on whose knowledge and accuracy I can depend, informed me that within the last few years he had seen and examined a copy at a sale in London, where it fetched £100, and was resold the same day at an advanced price. The "Old Hundredth" was in this edition, and my belief is that here we first find the words from the Anglo-Genevan Psalter of 1556 adapted to the tune from the French-Genevan Psalter of 1554, a combination which has remained unbroken in England ever since.—Yours faithfully,

G. A. C.

P.S.—Since writing the above I find that Livingston states that the fifty-one psalms in the first edition of the Anglo-Genevan Psalter (1556) all had tunes. It appears also that the Scottish Psalter contained some tunes long before 1602. Livingston quotes a copy of Daye's Psalter of 1562 as being in the possession of Francis Fry, Esq., Cotham, Bristol.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The letter of Mr. Sheppard in your last issue is a very timely contribution to the evidence I adduced recently (at a meeting of the Musical Association) of the necessity for perfecting and completing the musical library at the British Museum. In that library we ought to be able to lay our hands on all the proofs necessary to decide many of the points raised by Mr. Sheppard. That it is useless to quote from second-hand evidence is quite apparent; what we want is reference to existing and available authority.

Mr. Sheppard speaks of the Old Hundredth tune as first appearing in a book dated 1561. This was the date given by the Rev. W. H. Havergal in his work on the "Old Hundredth," published in 1854. "But since he wrote three earlier versions have been discovered, one in a Genevan Psalter printed by Jean Crespin in 1553, another in a Psalter printed by N. Barbier and T. Conteau (probably at Geneva) in 1559, and a third by Crespin in 1560" (Dr. Rimbault "On the Old Psalm and Hymn Composers," in The Leisure Hour).

Psalters and Hymnals have received so little attention from students that it is not safe to trust to descriptions made by any but experts, and even in the latter case details should be given as to the locality where the actual volumes may be consulted and the statements verified.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In my letter on Early Metrical Psalters with musical notes, in the last number of the MUSICAL TIMES (January, p. 38) I was unable to give any information respecting Day's Psalter of 1562, beyond the evidently incomplete title from Burney and Hawkins (apparently copied from Warton), nor had I met with any account of the existence of the book. By the kindness of the Rev. H. Parr (Vicar of Yoxford and editor of "Church of England Psalmody") I am now able to supply both these deficiencies.

Mr. Parr writes to me, "Dr. Allon gives a collation of the Psalter of 1562 in his Congregational Psalmist, 1866. The title runs thus: 'The Whole Booke of Psalmes, collected into Englysh metre by T. Starnhold, I. Hopkins & others: conferred with the Ebrue, with apt notes to synge thē withal, Faithfully perused and alowed according to thordre appointed in the Quenes maiesties Iniunctions.'"

Of this important edition there appears to be no copy either in the British Museum nor in any of our public libraries, and yet, in spite of its rareness, Mr. Parr says, "It seems that two copies had passed through Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's hands a short time before 1867. One was sold to Mr. Lennox, of Boston, U.S., and the other to Mr. Boone, of Bond Street. They realised £25 or £30 apiece. Another copy seems to be with Mr. Christie Miller, of Craigintillie."

He also reminds me that I have omitted to notice a rare Scotch Psalter, "The Whole Psalmes of David in Englysh Metre" (I am unable to give the full title), printed at Edinburgh by Robert Lekpreuik in 1565. I was aware of the existence of this book (the date of which I have also seen quoted as 1564), but not that it had, as Mr. Parr informs me it has, musical notes. Of course the list of Early Printed Psalters given in your last number does not pretend to be perfect—I know of none that is, and for that reason sent mine merely as an attempt in that direction. If it contains errors, I shall willingly be corrected; and, in respect of omissions, I shall be glad of whatever information any of your readers may be able to supply.

H. F. S.

M. DEBAIN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me to correct an error in the notice, inserted in the last number of your paper, of the death of M. Debain.

Alluding to his achievements, the notice states "he constructed a mechanical organ-tree," &c.: it should have been "orange-tree."

The concertina spoken of as his invention differs from the instrument known here in England by the same name, and invented by the late Sir Charles Wheatstone. I feel bound to mention this, knowing that M. Debain was the last person to claim for himself the invention of another.

In my opinion, the best examples of M. Debain's successful ingenuity are shown in the now well-known piano-mécanique, and in the large harmonium made for the Paris Exhibition of 1867. In this harmonium, containing 50 sets of (or 3,050 separate) vibrators, the clavier divisions are controlled by one pallet only to each key (instead of ten or more, if constructed in the usual manner) thus reducing the weight of touch to the resistance of one pallet and its spring.—I am, sir, yours obediently,

J. STUTTAFORD,
Manager of Debain and Co.'s London House.

THE STENOGRAPHONE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In the MUSICAL TIMES of last month you have recorded the death of M. Alexandre François Debain. There is an instrument called the Stenographone, for "noting down music as it is being executed upon the keyboard," of which the above lamented gentleman was the inventor. Can you, or any of the numerous readers of your excellent journal, inform me where, and at what price, I could procure the stenographone?—Yours, &c.,

A YOUNG COMPOSER.

We cannot prolong the correspondence upon our notice of the "Parochial Psalter," especially as the Editor of the work, in his letter of explanation, justifies the remarks of our reviewer by using the expression "stress (or length of sound)," thus confusing emphasis with duration.—Ed. MUSICAL TIMES.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 *Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BANBURY.—The second Concert of the Choral Society for this season took place on Friday evening, the 4th ult., at the Town Hall, when Rossini's Stabat Mater and Macfarren's Christmas were performed. With one exception, the solos were allotted to amateurs, and the Society is to be congratulated on having members who can so well interpret the various items. The professional singer was Miss Jessie Royd; the other soloists were Miss F. Edmunds, Mr. W. P. Ellis, and Mr. T. E. Rowland. A couple of pianos formed the instrumental accompaniment, played by Miss Draper and Mr. J. Booth. Mr. Hardacre conducted.

BANFF.—An Evening Concert was given in the St. Andrew's Masonic Hall on Wednesday evening, the 9th ult., in aid of the funds of the Banff Dispensary and Soup Kitchen. A special feature of the concert was the performance of five lady violinists. The programme was well selected, and the artists very efficient. The concert was conducted by Herr J. Hoffmann, who deserves high praise for the thorough training and care bestowed upon his pupils.

BANGOR.—The members of the Choral Society gave a performance of Handel's Oratorio Judas Maccabæus on December 27. The solo vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. E. Morlais, and Mr. Andrew McCall, of York Minster. Mr. William Williams conducted. The concert was a great success.

Batley.—The members of the Choral Society gave their twenty-eighth Concert in the Drill Hall (by kind permission of Captain Hemingway) on Monday the 7th ult., when Sir Michael Costa's Oratorio Eli was performed with full band and chorus. The principal vocalists were Miss Henrietta Tomlinson, Madame Galli, Mr. E. Kempe, and Mr. Farley Sinkins. Herr Vettor led the band, and Mr. J. W. Bowling conducted. The execution of the work was highly efficient, and was received with general satisfaction.

Belfast.—Mendelssohn's Symphony Cantata The Hymn of Praise and a miscellaneous selection formed the programme at the Belfast Choral Association's Concert on the 8th ult. There was no band, but Mr. W. T. Best presided at the Mulholland organ, and brought into full play the resources of the instrument, producing all the effects of a full orchestra. Miss Catherine Penna, Mrs. Scott Fennell, and Mr. Shakespeare were the vocalists. Mr. Walter Newport conducted throughout the evening with great efficiency.——The Temperance Choral Association gave a Concert in the Music Hall on Friday evening, the 11th ult. The programme comprised a miscellaneous selection, Locke's music to Macbeth, and readings by Mr. Robert Houston. The part allotted to the members of the Society consisted of the Choruses in Macbeth, Sir R. P. Stewart's arrangement of "The winecup is circling," and a vocal waltz by Taylor, named "Beauteous," all of which were well rendered under the baton of Mr. D. M'Gahey, the Conductor of the Society. Mr. Cohen accompanied the Macbeth music, and performed the violin part in the Duet from Guillaume Tell, the pianoforte part being ably sustained by Miss Henrietta M'Gahey, who also played with much brilliancy Osborne's Fantasia on Irish and Scotch Airs. Miss Lily Browne, Miss Lee, and Mr. W. J. Moore gave several vocal solos with much effect; and the concert was in every respect highly successful.——The second Concert of the Philharmonic Society for the present season was given on the 18th ult. in the Ulster Hall. The programme was miscellaneous, and the selections exceedingly interesting. The principal artists were Mdlle. Alwina Valleria, Madame Lablache, Mdlle. Parodi, Signor Runcio, Signor del Puente, Signor Rocca, and Signor Foli, M. Musin (violinist), and Signor Li Calsi (pianist), all of whom were highly successful, Mdlle. Valleria and Madame Lablache receiving the warmest applause, and Signor Foli eliciting a double encore for one of his songs. The members of the Society, under the conductorship of Sir Robert Stewart, performed their part with great credit to themselves and satisfaction to the audience. The concert was, on the whole, an exceedingly enjoyable one.

Birmingham.—The annual performance of the Messiah by the Festival Choral Society took place in the Town Hall, on Wednesday, December 26. The principal vocalists were Mesdames Sinico and Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Lander. The Choruses were well sung, and the orchestra good, Mr. Robinson's trumpet obbligato being particularly admired. Mr. Stockley conducted with skill and judgment. —— The following evening the Philharmonic Union gave Mendelssohn's Elijah, with Miss Emma Beasley, Miss Orridge, Mr. Seligmann, and Mr. Cross as principals. Miss Beasley sang the soprano solos with taste and effect, particularly the Air "Hear ye, Israel." Miss Orridge, by her dramatic feeling, created a marked impression; and Messrs. Seligmann and Cross acquitted themselves well. The concerted pieces, in which Mrs. Bellamy, Miss E. Bailey, Mr. Woodhall, and Mr. Carless assisted, were remarkably well given, and the more delicate Choruses beautifully sung, more power being requisite for the heavier numbers. The band was most efficient. Dr. Heap conducted at both concerts, and Mr. Stimpson rendered valuable aid at the organ.——Messrs. Harrison, who always engage the first artists for their subscription concerts, being disappointed of Madame Nilsson and Herr Wilhelmj at their first concert this season on the 3rd ult., gave, as a compensation to their subscribers, a gratis Invitation Concert, when Miss Robertson, Mdlle. Enriquez, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. F. H. Celli, M. Henri Ketten, and Herr Wilhelmj were engaged. The programme was excellently performed. M. Ketten created quite a furore by his pianoforte-playing, and Herr Wilhelmj met with his usual enthusiastic reception. Encores were numerous, and the liberality of the concert-givers was thoroughly appreciated by their subscribers.——An able and interesting lecture on "The Musical Drama" was given by Mr. E. J. Breakspear to the members of the Birmingham Fine Arts Guild on the 9th ult. The progress of the musical drama was traced from the earliest Greek plays to the latest development of the theories of Wagner.——Dr. Swinnerton Heap gave a Pianoforte Recital at the theatre of the Midland Institute on Thursday the 10th ult. The programme included examples from Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Reinecke, Raff, Rheinberger, and Heller. The whole was admirably executed, and the performer warmly applauded. Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. J. H. Kearton, in place of Mr. Vernon Rigby, who was suffering from hoarseness. Mr. Pearce accompanied.

Bradford.—Mr. Midgley gave his second Chamber Concert at the Church Institute on the 7th ult. The executants, in addition to Mr. Midgley, were, violin, Herr Ludwig Straus; viola, Herr Otto Bernhardt; and violoncello, M. H. Vieuxtemps. The programme consisted exclusively of chamber music, and the concert opened with a Quartett in E flat for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello, composed by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, of Edinburgh, which was new to a Bradford audience. Beethoven's Trio for Strings (Op. 9, No. 1); Bach's Sonata in A, for piano and violin; Mendelssohn's Variations Concertantes (Op. 17) in D, for piano and violoncello; and Beethoven's Trio in D (Op. 70, No. 1), for piano, violin, and violoncello, were most artistically played, and enthusiastically received.

Brighouse.—A very successful performance of Handel's Oratorio Samson was given in the Town Hall by the Choral Society on December 28. The artists engaged were Mrs. Brook Myers, Madame Galli, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. Andrew McCall. Mr. O. Sladdin conducted, and Mr. Bowling led the band.

Brighton.—A Morning Concert was given on December 28 by Miss White at St. Michael's Place, the vocalists being Signor Luigi Conti and Mr. Faulkner Leigh. The Conductors were Messrs. White and Thorn.

Bristol.—On Monday the 21st ult. the first Monday Popular Concert for the present year was given in the Colston Hall. Out of respect to the memory of the late Mr. Alfred Stone, Handel's "Dead March," from Saul, was played at the commencement of the concert, and, like all the other orchestral works, was very well rendered by Mr. Riseley's band of about forty performers. Haydn's Symphony No. 6, in B flat; Sterndale Bennett's Overture The Naiades; and Rossini's Il Barbiere di Siviglia, were amongst the most important items in the programme. Mr. H. Taylor, of Wells Cathedral, was the vocalist, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.

Buckley, Chester.—An Organ Recital was given in the Congregational Church on Wednesday evening, December 26, 1877, by Mr. J. R. Griffiths, Organist of Highgate Congregational Church, London. The programme included pieces by Bach, Gounod, Neustedt, Mendelssohn, &c., all of which were excellently rendered, and gave great satisfaction to a numerous and appreciative audience. The Recital was varied by several songs sung by the Misses Catherall, Messrs. Jones, Hopwood, and Griffiths. The Recital (the first ever given in this neighbourhood) was in every sense a success, and is likely to be the forerunner of many other interesting evenings of the kind.

Carnarvon.—A grand Concert was given in the recently erected Pavilion on the 12th ult. by the following artists: Mdlle. Alwina Valleria, Madame Lablache, Mdlle. Parodi, Signor Runcio, Signor del Puente, Signor Rocca, Signor Foli, M. Musin (violin), and Mr. F. H. Cowen (pianist). The programme contained a selection of Songs, Duets, Quartetts, &c., which were rendered in the most efficient manner, and received with the greatest appreciation. M. Musin's violin solos were warmly redemanded, his brilliant execution gaining the admiration of all. The instrumental portion of the concert, including Mr. Cowen's pianoforte accompaniments, was in itself a treat rarely to be met with in the Principality.

Clifton.—On Tuesday the 8th ult. two Classical Concerts were given at the Victoria Rooms by Mr. J. C. Daniel. The artists were Madame Norman-Néruda (violin), Mr. Charles Hallé (pianoforte), Herr Franz Néruda (violoncello), and Mdlle. Enriquez (vocalist). The programmes were excellently arranged, and included Beethoven's Grand Trios in D, Op. 70, No. 1, and in B flat, Op. 97; Mendelssohn's Grand Trio in C minor, Op. 66, Haydn's in G, and Schubert's Notturno in E flat. Mr. Hallé's performances were highly appreciated, as were also the other solos. Mdlle. Enriquez gave some vocal music in her usual artistic style.——The annual Ladies' Night of the Bristol Madrigal Society was given in the Victoria Rooms on Thursday the 10th ult., and was, as usual, one of the greatest treats afforded to local musicians in the course of the season. The programme consisted of compositions all of which had, we believe, been previously given by the Society, and the fact that no less than eight encores were demanded and conceded testifies to the popularity of the selection. The older Madrigal writers were represented by Morley, Hilton, Weelkes, Luca Marenzio, Wilbye, Ford, and Saville. Samuel Wesley's "O sing unto mie roundelaie" represented a later date, and four Part-songs by modern composers (Leslie, Mendelssohn, Smart, and G. A. Macfarren) were also included in the selection. It would have been a slight to the memory of the late R. L. de Pearsall, who was one of the earliest members of this Society, and for which he wrote many of his popular compositions, if an open night had been given without some of his works being performed. On this occasion his charming Madrigal, "I saw lovely Phillis, and "Sir Patrick Spens," had to be repeated, his Part-song, "O who will o'er the downs so free," being also included in the programme. Mr. E. A. Harvey, the Secretary, is to be congratulated on the excellence of the arrangements, and Mr. D. W. Rootham on the efficient manner in which he conducted.

Coventry.— The Christmas Services at St. John Baptist's Church commenced with full choral evensong on the Eve, at which Gounod's "Bethlehem" was sung as the Anthem, and at Matins on Christmas Day Sullivan's Te Deum in D and E. H. Thorne's Anthem "In the beginning was the Word." A full choral celebration of Holy Communion, at which Marbeck's music was used, concluded the Service. Processional and recessional hymns were sung at all the Festival Services. The choir, under the direction of Mr. J. Finch Thorne, performed the musical portions of the Services in a careful and reverent manner.——A performance of the Messiah was given on New Year's Day at the Corn Exchange by the Musical Society. The solos were sung by Miss Agnes Larkcom, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The band and chorus, consisting of nearly 170 performers, were highly efficient. Mr. Arthur Trickett, F.C.O., conducted.

Dartford, Kent.—A very successful concert was given in the Victoria Assembly Rooms on Monday evening, the 21st ult. The artists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Dones, Mr. Stedman, M. Buziau, Mr. Walter Pettit, and Mr. Henry Parker, all of whom were thoroughly appreciated by a large and fashionable audience. The concert was under the direction of Mr. Stedman, who provided an excellent programme.

Edinburgh.—Sir Herbert Oakeley's Organ Recital on the 10th ult. attracted a large audience. The programme was extremely interesting, and every piece was warmly received, Hummel's Aria, from his Septett, being enthusiastically encored.

Enniskillen, Ireland.—A purse of gold was given to Mr. Robert McKeague, on Monday evening, the 14th ult., as a mark of respect for his long-continued services as bass singer in Enniskillen church choir. The presentation was made in the Town Hall, where an entertainment was provided for the clergy, churchwardens, organist, and choir. During the evening hymns, &c. were sung by the choir, under the direction of Mr. Arnold, the organist, and songs were given by various members of the choir.

Erith.—On the 17th ult. the Choral Society gave a performance of Barnett's Paradise and the Peri (under the directorship of Mr. Richard Lemaire) at the Public Hall. The solos were rendered, for the first time, by members of the Society, and were admirably delivered, the soprano being particularly successful. The choir (which numbers about sixty voices) sang with great spirit and precision, showing that a vast amount of care had been bestowed upon the work by Conductor and singers. Mr. W. Byron accompanied with great skill on the piano, and Mr. Jury on the harmonium.

FALKIRK, N.B.—At the Christmas Service in Christ Church the musical portion was especially good. In the Anthem, "Behold, I bring you glad tidings" (Smith), the solo was sung by Mr. T. Sweeney; and the two Christmas hymns, "O come, all ye faithful," and "Hark, the herald angels sing," were heartily joined in by a large congregation. Mr. Watson Lee presided at the organ, and played Handel's "Pastoral Symphony" and "Silver Trumpets" as voluntaries. The Proper Psalms were chanted to Attwood in E flat and Turle in F, and the Te Deum was by Dr. Oakeley in F.

GEORGETOWN, DEMERARA.—A performance of Handel's Messiah was given in St. Philip's Church on Friday, December 28, 1877, in aid of the funds of the church. The Oratorio was given under the direction of Mr. W. R. Colbeck (Organist of St. Philip's), who acted as chorus-master. This was, we understand, the first time an Oratorio has been given in Demerara, and the performance on the whole was most successful. The chorus numbered about 100 voices, and the soloists were amateurs. Mr. C. Fricke ably conducted, and Mr. W. R. Colbeck accompanied on the organ. Brass and reed instruments were introduced in some of the Choruses, played by members of the Militia Band. The performance gave great satisfaction to a large audience (His Excellency the Governor, Mrs. Kortright, and the Bishop of the Diocese being present), and the sum of about £125 was realised.

GLASGOW.—The introductory Concert for this year of the St. George's Choral Union took place in the City Hall on the 2nd ult. Gounod's De Profundis was performed for the first time, and met with a most favourable reception. This work was followed by Gade's Crusaders, a Cantata now well known in Glasgow. The vocalists were Miss Catherine Penna, Mr. J. H. Pearson, and Mr. W. Winn. Mr. J. T. Carrodus led the band, and Mr. William Moodie conducted.

GUELPH, ONTARIO, CANADA.—A Society entitled the "Guelph Musical Union" has been recently formed in this town, the object of which is stated to be "to promote the practice and performance of first-class music, both sacred and secular, by regular meetings for that purpose, and by public concerts." The Association, which is placed under the conductorship of Professor Philp, is highly patronised; and there is every hope that it may do much to cultivate a taste for the best music in this locality.

KELSO.—On Friday evening, the 4th ult., a Miscellaneous Concert was given in the Corn Exchange by the chorus and band of the Choral Union, assisted by Miss C. Penna, Messrs. Sydney and Winn. Mrs. A. Heap contributed pianoforte solos, obtaining an encore for the first piece. Mr. Alfred Heap, Organist to the Earl of Home, conducted.

KENDAL.—On the 19th ult. a Concert of sacred and secular music was given in the Town Hall by Miss Harriet Kendall (of the Royal Academy of Music), assisted by Miss Emilie Lloyd (contralto), Mr. H. T. Bywater (tenor), and Mr. Farley Sinkins (bass). Selections from Acis and Galatea; Judas Maccabæus; God, Thou art great; Fidelio; Maritana; Lily of Killarney; and Les Huguenots were extremely well rendered. An effective soprano song "Spring-child" (words and music by Miss Harriet Kendall) was given with great success.

LINCOLN.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed here for the first time on the 8th ult. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. J. L. Wadmore, and Signor Foli, and Mr. E. Dunkerton, of Lincoln Cathedral Choir. The chorus numbered about seventy voices, besides which there was a band of over twenty performers, selected from the orchestras of Nottingham, Birmingham, Derby, and Lincoln. The performance was exceedingly good, and was thoroughly enjoyed by a crowded and fashionable audience. Mr. J. Barratt, Mus. Bac., Oxon., was the Conductor, and Mr. J. H. Twinn, Nottingham, led the band.

LIVERPOOL.—A musical service was held at St. Saviour's Church, Falkner Square, on December 27, when the Bach Society, assisted by several leading members of the Bootle Choral Society—both under the able guidance of Mr. J. W. Appleyard—gave the first five portions of the Christmas Oratorio. The Bach Society was only formed last winter, and from a small beginning is gradually increasing in proportions. Mr. Appleyard is a thorough and zealous Choirmaster, and the rendering of the various choral portions of the Oratorio was generally speaking admirable. The great Chorus, "Glory to God," was very finely sung; and among other numbers which were more than ordinarily successful was the beautiful Chorus in F, "Come and thank Him." The various Chorals were sung with a smoothness and attention to all marks of expression which call for high commendation. The solos were taken unostentatiously by various members of the Society. Dr. Bridge accompanied the music on the organ throughout.——The members of the North Philharmonic Society gave their annual performance of the Messiah on New Year's Night in the Hall of the College, Shaw Street, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Lloyd Parry, the Conductor of the Society. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Orridge, Mr. Selwyn Graham, and Mr. Tinney, of St. Paul's Cathedral. Mr. Henry Lawson led the band, and Mr. J. W. Waugh, F.C.O., presided at the organ. The band and chorus numbered over 200 performers. The soloists acquitted themselves in a highly satisfactory manner, and the Choruses were well sustained throughout. The spacious hall was crowded.

MELBOURNE.—The performance of Spohr's Oratorio The Fall of Babylon by the Melbourne Oratorio Society, on October 20, was highly creditable to all concerned, for, notwithstanding the want of power in several of the great Choruses, the evidence of careful preparation was shown throughout. Miss Christian, Mrs. Herz, and Mr. Armes Beaumont, assisted by Messrs. Lamble and Angus, were highly efficient in the solo parts, Mrs. Herz in the Songs "Dear child of bondage," and "O Zion, how bright are the hopes that attend thee," creating a marked effect, Miss Christian giving the music which fell to her share with that intelligence and artistic feeling to which she has accustomed her audience, and Mr. Beaumont proving himself unquestionably the best tenor singer of oratorio music in Australia. There was an excellent orchestra, led by Mr. E. King; and Mr. Herz was an able Conductor.

MOLD.—A special service was held in the Parish Church on the evening of St. John's Day, at which a portion of Handel's Oratorio the Messiah was sung by the united choirs of Mold, Gwernafield, and Caerfallwch. The whole was very well rendered, and reflected great credit on all the executants, the boys especially receiving great praise. The arrangements were under the control of Mr. Lyle, who presided at the organ. The members of the parish choir, in appreciation of the great pains Mr. Lyle has taken in instructing them, presented him, on Christmas Day, with a handsomely bound organ copy of the [new edition of "Hymns Ancient and Modern," folio size.

MONTROSE.—On Friday evening, the 4th ult., the members of the Harmonic Union—Mr. C. B. Taylor, Conductor—gave their first Concert of the season in the Assembly Hall, before a large and appreciative audience. The first part of the programme consisted of Dr. Mason's new Cantata the Voyage, which was well rendered and much applauded. The second part was miscellaneous, consisting of Glees, Part-songs, and popular songs of the day. The concert reflected great credit upon the Conductor, and was one of the most successful ever given by the Union. Miss Maggie Taylor and Mr. John Hall presided at the pianoforte and harmonium.

NEW BROMPTON, KENT.—An Evening Concert was given in the Public Hall, on Tuesday the 16th ult., which was most successful. An Overture, and an improvised selection, by Mr. F. G. Chant, the pianist and accompanist, were admirably executed; and the vocal music was well sung by Mr. H. Hoare's Concert and Glee Party, assisted by Miss Cissie Colesworthy. This young vocalist possesses a soprano voice of much power and considerable compass. Her songs were enthusiastically encored. Mr. Tom Jobling and Mr. W. H. Rowe fully deserved the applause they received.

NEW YORK.—Theodore Thomas's third Symphony Concert at Steinway Hall, on the 5th ult., included the following excellent works, all of which were well rendered: select movements from Handel, J. S. Bach's Concerto for three pianos, performed by Messrs. R. Hoffman, W. Mason, and F. Dulcken; masonic music by Mozart; Overture, Coriolan, Beethoven; and Symphony by Brahms, Op. 68.

NORTH MALVERN.—The new organ, built by Mr. John Nicholson, of Worcester, for Holy Trinity Church, was opened on the 15th ult. by Mr. W. Haynes, Organist of the Priory Church, Malvern. There was full choral service in the morning, and at 3.30 an Organ Recital was given, when an excellent programme of classical music was performed before a crowded audience.

QUEENSTOWN.—On Friday evening, the 4th ult., a Concert was given in the large room of the Queen's Hotel in aid of the local Coal Fund, by the members of Rushbrook Choir, assisted by several friends. The programme was most attractive. Miss Miloro and Miss Power were encored in their songs; Messrs. W. W. Harvey, J. H. Scott, W. Wheeler, P. St. J. Murphy, and Captain Dashwood were well received in their solos, and Messrs. Harvey, Seymour, Wheeler, and Murphy elicited much applause for their rendering of two Orpheus glees. Miss Howard and Mr. Waters accompanied, and Mr. R. Howard conducted in a highly creditable manner. There was a large audience, and a good sum was realised for the fund.

RICHMOND, YORKS.—Mr. James H. Rooks gave his Annual Concert in the Assembly Rooms on Tuesday the 14th ult., when the first part of Handel's Messiah, and a miscellaneous selection of Part-songs, Duets, &c., were performed. The soloists in the Messiah were Mrs. J. G. Croft, Miss Charlesworth, Mr. Priestman, and Mr. C. G. Croft, and in the miscellaneous selection Miss Pollock, Miss Horne, Mr. W. Pybus Horne, Sir John Lawson, Bart. (violoncello), Herr Moosmair (violin), and Mr. J. H. Rooks (piano). The Choruses and Part-songs were very effectively given by the Richmond Amateur Choral Union, under the direction of its Conductor, Mr. J. H. Rooks. The Choruses "And He shall purify," "For unto us," and "His yoke is easy" were especially well sung.

STROUD.—Special services were held at St. Lawrence's Church on Sunday the 6th ult. The services were fully choral. The music in the morning included Jackson's Te Deum and Jubilate, Tallis's Responses, Kyrie by Elvey, and Sanctus and "I will call upon the Lord" and "Glorious is Thy Name" from Mozart's Twelfth Mass. The sermon was preached by the vicar, the Rev. Dr. Badcock. In the evening the music included Jackson's Cantate and Deus and selections from Mozart's Twelfth Mass. The Psalms, both morning and evening, were chanted to Elvey's pointing, and selections from the Twelfth Mass were played as voluntaries. The choir (which is a voluntary one) was highly efficient; and Mr. Chew, the Organist and Choirmaster, played in a masterly manner.

THRAPSTONE, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.—The members of the Choral Society gave a successful performance of Handel's Messiah on Wednesday the 16th ult. in the Corn Exchange, under the able conductorship of Mr. B. Manders, Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church, and St. Peter's College, Peterborough. The Choruses were sung with great precision and care. Miss Marion Williams, of the Royal Academy of Music, sang the soprano solos, and her rendering of "Rejoice greatly," and "I know that my Redeemer liveth" deserves the greatest praise. The contralto solos were excellently sung by Mrs. Stott, of Peterborough. The tenor and bass solos were most ably rendered by Messrs. Jones and Swift, of Peterborough Cathedral Choir. Mr. Manders, the Conductor of the Society, is to be congratulated on the successful result of his efforts.

TOWCESTER.—A complimentary Benefit Concert to Mr. Simmonds took place at the Town Hall on Tuesday the 8th ult., when a highly attractive programme was given. Madame Cross Lavers was very successful in "Let the bright seraphim" (which, in the absence of a band, was accompanied by Miss C. Bailey on the pianoforte and Mr. Simmonds on the harmonium); Miss Kermar (her first appearance at Towcester) by her brilliant singing at once established herself in the good opinion of her hearers; and Mr. Hilton, bandmaster 3rd N.R.V., gave his clarionet solo with much effect, and was deservedly applauded. Mr. Simmonds is to be congratulated on his audience, amongst which were most of the leading families of the town and neighbourhood where he has been a resident for the past twenty years.

ULVERSTON.—A recently formed Choral Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. E. Brown, Organist of St. James's, Barrow-in-Furness (with the Rev. F. G. McNally, L.Mus., as honorary secretary), was inaugurated by a concert on December 28, when there was a very crowded room. Romberg's Lay of the Bell and a miscellaneous selection were very creditably gone through by the members of the Society. The professional vocalists engaged were Madame Grayston, Messrs. Verney Binns and Rickard.

WAINFLEET.—On Tuesday the 15th ult. the Spilsby and Wainfleet Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Keller, gave its seventh Concert, before a crowded audience. The programme, consisting of orchestral music, Part-songs, Duets, Songs, &c. was selected from the works of Mozart, H. Smart, G. A. Macfarren, Cowen, Pinsuti, Danby, Braga, &c., and gave general satisfaction. Mr. T. L. Selby, violoncellist, of Nottingham, and Mr. G. H. Gregory, Mus. Bac., Oxon., and Organist of the Parish Church, Boston, contributed greatly to the success of the concert.

WANDSWORTH.—The first Evening Concert of the Glee Union was given on the 14th ult. at the St. Michael's Mission Room, Bolingbroke Grove, Wandsworth Common. The programme was well arranged, and contained several well-known Glees, which were creditably sung by the choir. Miss Bessie Spear and Mr. Roberts made a favourable impression in their songs. Messrs. Charles Small, Strong, Hennings, and Linnington were also highly effective in their rendering of several old English Glees, &c. Miss Rosa Henman accompanied and played some pianoforte solos. The concert was under the direction of Mr. Thomas Chappell, Conductor of the Society. The proceeds will be given to the St. Michael's Mission Fund.

WATFORD.—A Concert in aid of the funds of the London Orphan Asylum was given in the Town Hall, under the direction of Sir Julius Benedict, on December 31. The artists were Miss Annie Sinclair, Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, Signor Vergara, Mr. Wharton, and Mr. Burnham Horner. The hall was crowded, and the proceeds added to the funds of the Asylum amounted to £75.

WIMBLEDON.—Mr. Gerard Henry gave his third Annual Concert on Monday the 7th ult., assisted by Miss Marion Williams, R.A.M., Miss Martha Harries, R.A.M., Miss Green, Mr. Walter Wadmore, Mr. T. E. Gatehouse (violin), Mr. Stephen Jarvis and Mr. W. D. Sumner (solo pianists and Conductors). Miss Williams gave an excellent rendering of "Gelert's Grave," as did Miss Harries of "The Lost Chord," each being redemanded. Mr. Gatehouse was very successful in his solos, which were highly appreciated. The bénéficiaire, Mr. Gerard Henry, was well received in his selections, notably in a new baritone song composed for him by Mr. Stephen Jarvis, entitled "Country, Home, and King," which had to be repeated. The concert was a complete success.

WOKINGHAM.—Mr. T. S. Brown's Annual Concert took place at the Town Hall on Monday evening, the 14th ult. The vocalists were Miss Annie Sinclair, Miss Emily Brown, Mr. G. Packer, Mr. T. Hunt, Mr. A. Marriott, and Mr. B. Ramsbottom; violinists, Mr. J. S. Liddle and Master H. W. Hunt; accompanists, Messrs. J. S. Liddle, A. Marriott, and R. M. Brown. Miss Sinclair was enthusiastically recalled after each of her songs. Miss Brown gained an encore for "What we have loved, we love for ever" (Pinsuti), and Mr. Ramsbottom for "Youth and age" (Adams). The Part-music was admirably rendered and warmly applauded. Mr. Liddle fully sustained his reputation as an excellent performer on both violin and pianoforte, and his pupil, Master Hunt, acquitted himself well. The instrumental part of the programme included compositions by Handel, Rubinstein, Bach, and Spohr.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The members of the Festival Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah on December 28 in the Agricultural Hall. Mr. Stockley conducted. The artists were Miss Mary Davies (Parepa-Rosa Gold Medalist, R.A.M.), Madame Alice Barnett, Mr. J. H. Kearton, and Mr. J. L. Wadmore. The whole of the Solos, Recitatives, and Airs were admirably rendered. Miss Davies was highly effective in the Air, "Hear ye, Israel." The Choruses were throughout marked by the greatest precision.

WORCESTERSHIRE.—On New Year's Day a supper was given to the three choirs of the Parish Church, St. Gabriel's Church, and the Rhydd Court Chapel, Harley Castle (numbering about fifty), at the Rhydd Court, by Sir Edmund and Lady Lechmere. After supper, the esteemed Organist and Choirmaster of the Rhydd Court Chapel and St. Gabriel's, in responding to Sir Edmund's eulogistic remarks on the Organist's talent and care, and the consequent successful state of the choirs, proceeded on their behalf to offer for the acceptance of the Rev. T. W. Wood, Chaplain at Rhydd Court, a handsome barometer and hall clock, a set of serviette rings, and an illuminated address (admirably and chastely executed by Mr. W. Elzy, of Great Malvern), as an acknowledgment of his interest on their behalf during the past five years. The Rev. T. W. Wood, in thanking them for such an unexpected gift, said he could not speak too highly of Mr. Bovington, and the successful efforts he had made to bring the choirs into their present efficient state. The proceedings during the evening were interspersed with some excellent singing by various members of the choirs.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. George H. Cox, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Tettenhall, near Wolverhampton.——Mr. William Charles Hall, Organist and Choirmaster to St. John's Church, The Green, Southall, W.——Mr. William Masefield, jun., to the English Presbyterian Church, New John Street, West Birmingham.——Miss M. TO CHORAL SOCIETIES.

ORCHESTRAL PARTS.

Since the reduction in the price of music in 1849, by Mr. J. A. Novello, Choral Societies have so rapidly grown up and developed that works requiring full orchestral accompaniments are now, rather as a rule than an exception, included in their public performances. Hitherto, however, the price of band parts has been so high that, instead of purchasing, it has been the custom to hire them whenever a composition demanding such aid has been given. In order to obviate the necessity of this, Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have decided that in future all Orchestral Parts shall be marked at the uniform rate of Sixpence per Sheet, thus enabling Institutions to form a permanent library for the orchestra, as well as for the choir, at a small additional outlay.

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

ASHDOWN & PARRY'S

Albums of Dance Music

THE ever-increasing sale of these Albums in the United Kingdom, the Colonies, and America is the best evidence that the judicious selection of the Dances in them is thoroughly appreciated. Many publications of the kind contain a large proportion of music which has been found to be unsuccessful in the ordinary form; the music in ASHDOWN & PARRY'S Albums, on the contrary, is the best of its kind, and every piece has in its original form attained great popularity; in this respect they are unique, and form a permanent, attractive, and varied selection of excellent Dance Music in a portable and convenient form at an extremely low price.

ALBERT LOWE'S

EASTER ANTHEM.

THE LORD IS MY STRENGTH. Short, easy, and effective. Octavo, 3d. "Mr. Lowe writes with the gravity and earnestness of a true composer for the Church. This little Anthem is well adapted to meet the wants of small choirs, and cannot fail of acceptance when looked at from the higher ground of religious edification. Moreover, it shows a thoroughly musicianly spirit, and that rare gift, the ars est celare artem."—Sunday Times.

"This Anthem amply fulfils the announcement on the title-page; it is 'short' and 'easy'—the subjects, moreover, being both melodious and well harmonised. The unexpected chord of B flat, after the lingering of the voices upon D, is a point worthy of attention; and the manner in which the harmonies flow towards the final close is well deserving of commendation. The Anthem will, we think, be found extremely useful."—Musical Times.

"Mr. Lowe has contributed to Church congregations and Choral Societies a 'short, easy, and full' Anthem, which is calculated to afford much satisfaction, and to be largely in request. The subject is treated in a truly devotional spirit, and with musicianly skill, and it is well harmonised."—News of the World.

"An excellent Anthem."—The Church Times.

PRONUNCIATION FOR SINGERS

WITH ESPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE

ENGLISH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, AND FRENCH LANGUAGES,

WITH NUMEROUS EXAMPLES AND EXERCISES, BY ALEXANDER J. ELLIS, F.R.S.

Price 4s. 6d.

This full and complete work by the late President of the Philological Society, who has given thirty years to the study of the subject, and of whom Professor Max Müller says that he is "by far the most accurate observer and analyser in the field of phonetics," is novel, and full of exercises and illustrations. The diagrams on page 14 form the key to its method. These fix the pronunciation of the common English sounds, and from them variations are made for each new language. The exercises are varied. The student of German, for example, will find exercises on the German speech-sounds, an alphabetic key to German pronunciation, examples of German songs, translated, and pronounced, and the pronunciation of the names of German musicians. There is also a great mass of information on pronunciation generally, and especially on the modification of vowels by the singer.

A copy of this work, post-free, may be obtained up to the end of February, by any Professor of Music who sends half-price (2s. 3d.), with address, to J. CURWEN and SONS, Press, Plaistow, London, E.

London: J. CURWEN and SONS, 8, Warwick Lane, E.C.

A DICTIONARY OF MUSICAL TERMS

EDITED BY

J. STAINER, M.A., MUS. DOC.,
Magd. Coll., Oxford,
AND
W. A. BARRETT, MUS. BAC.,
St. Mary Hall, Oxford.

The following Gentlemen have contributed to this Work:—

BULLEY, J., Esq., M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford.
CHAMPNEYS, F., Esq., B.M., M.A., M.R.C.S., of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, late Radcliffe Travelling Fellow of the University of Oxford.
CHAPPELL, W., Esq., F.S.A.
DONKIN, A. E., Esq., M.A., F.R.A.S., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.
ELLIS, A. J., Esq., B.A., F.R.S., F.S.A., F.C.P.S., F.C.P., Trinity College, Cambridge.
GADSBY, HENRY, Esq.
HELMORE, Rev. T., M.A.
HULLAH, JOHN, Esq.
McNAUGHT, W. G., Esq.
MONK, W. H., Esq.

"Among articles which, though not absolutely indispensable in a Musical Dictionary, are well worth reading as treated in the Dictionary edited by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, may be mentioned 'applause' and 'dedication.' Indeed, apart from its high value as a work of reference, the Dictionary is interesting throughout."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, comes to supply the deficiency just at the time when people are waking up to the advantages of accuracy in all sorts of arts, and it is most welcome. Its title gives a very humble idea of its importance, suggesting rather dry definitions or technical explanations than what it really contains. The definitions and explanations are all there, and their multitude is truly astonishing, even the most out-of-the-way words receiving consideration; but besides this there is a great quantity of valuable essays, not only by the editors, but also by men well known to the public for successful labours in the field of music and acoustics, such as Mr. Hullah and Mr. Ellis, the translator of Helmholtz, and Mr. William Chappell and Mr. Helmore."—The Academy.

"A 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett (Novello, Ewer and Co.), deserves especial mention, as the first attempt to supply the English reader with something that is not a limited glossary of technical words, but an encyclopædic book of reference on matters musical, such as German and Italian students have for some time been fortunate enough to possess."—The Graphic.

"In addition to this, the editors have derived information from many other equally good sources, so that the work is as trustworthy as it is complete, and professional and amateur musicians will alike owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett for one of the most useful musical works ever produced."—Standard.

"It is the general character and tone of the volume that concerns general amateurs, who, at a little cost of time, can obtain from this volume information on theoretical and scientific subjects, without having to wade through complex works. The Dictionary displays careful research generally, and it is also imbued with an impartial spirit, which goes far to beget confidence in the writers. The book is illustrated with diagrams of instrumental workmanship, and is printed in very large and clear type."—The Athenæum.

SOUTHWELL SCHOOL SONGS. First series, 1s. 6d. By the Rev. R. F. SMITH, Minor Canon of Southwell.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Queen.—"Fourteen" (sixteen) "capital little songs in a cheap handy form. Quite new and withal pretty and neatly written."

The Schoolmaster.—"Easy, pleasing tunes, suitable to school use. The composer shows himself a true musician; each 'lay' has a separate tune, which is catching, appropriate, and quite in old ballad-song style."

The Musical Times.—"The sympathetic and musicianlike manner in which he has wedded them to melodies which cannot fail to please the young vocalists for whom they are expressly designed."

By the same Composer.

CHAPPELL'S PENNY OPERATIC PART-SONGS.

For Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass.

The present collection of Part-Songs is entirely new, being selected and adapted from the most striking and popular Choruses in the Favourite Foreign Operas. The Arrangement is purely Vocal, such Choruses only being chosen as can be sung without the aid of an Instrumental Accompaniment. The Words have been expressly written for the work, and the harmonies arranged in four parts, as likely to be most useful in small classes.

1.	Hymn of the Fisherman's Children	Adapted to a Melody from Herold's "Zampa."
2.	Fays and Elves (In mia fe)	From Flotow's "Marta."
3.	Spring's Bright Glances (In Elvezia non v'ha)	From Bellini's "La Sonnambula."
4.	From Yonder Vale and Hill (D' immenso giubilo)	From Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor."
5.	Here we Rest (Qui la selva)	From Bellini's "La Sonnambula."
6.	Onward to Battle (Squilli echeggi)	From Verdi's "Il Trovatore."
7.	Rataplan (Rataplan)	From Donizetti's "La Figlia del Reggimento."
8.	The Gipsy's Star (Vedi! le fosche)	From Verdi's "Il Trovatore."
9.	War Song of the Druids (Dell' aura tua profetica)	From Bellini's "Norma."
10.	In Mercy, hear us! (Ciclo clemente)	From Donizetti's "La Figlia del Reggimento."
11.	Come to the Fair! (Accorete, giovinette)	From Flotow's "Marta."
12.	Friendship (Per te d' immenso giubilo)	From Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor."
13.	Away, the Morning freshly breaking (The Chorus of Fishermen)	From Auber's "Masaniello."
14.	Pretty Village Maiden (Peasants' Serenade Chorus)	From Gounod's "Faust."

"The tone bears a striking resemblance to the vox humana stop of a large organ."—Musical Times.

"It is wonderfully sympathetic and voice-like in tone."—Literary World.

"Being easily learned, comparatively inexpensive, and pleasing in tone, it is likely to be in very general requisition."—City Press.

"Exceedingly sweet and pleasing in tone; and as it is easily mastered, it will, no doubt, soon become popular."—Pictorial World.

THIS original Musical Instrument is unequalled for the beauty and voice-like quality of its tone, and the ease with which it can be acquired—a very little practice enabling the performer to play operatic or other melodies. It has a complete chromatic scale, and forms a charming accompaniment to the Pianoforte. Prices: No. 1, 2s.; No. 2, 3s.; No. 3, 4s.; No. 4, 5s.; No. 5, 6s.; No. 6, 7s.; No. 7, 8s.

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS.

18, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON, W.

ON THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT. { "This most ingenious and valuable invention cannot fail to meet with success."
SYDNEY SMITH. "The touch is absolute perfection."
BRINLEY RICHARDS. { "A very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"The tone of the Grand now referred to possessed all the qualities that a good piano ought to have, and in touch and action was perfect. The sweet and silvery quality of the upper octaves was worthy of special admiration."—The Era.

"Sir Julius Benedict played his well-known composition, 'Where the Bee sucks,' on one of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Grand Pianos, with the recently patented improvements, which enabled him to produce the sustained tones with great variety of effect in the light and shade of tones, especially so when extreme delicacy of touch is required."—Court Journal.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"Admirable repetition, perfect sostenuto, and luscious tone of the instrument fully justified the performer's choice."—Sunday Times.

"Magnificent, grand, the air telling out with almost vocal clearness and sweetness to the bell-like treble arpeggio accompaniment, which contrasted excellently with the extraordinary power produced in the forte passages."—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

"An immense improvement in arpeggios. The rapid passages in the upper register, the beautiful flute-like tone, and quick and perfect repetition, were very effective."—Figaro.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' CONCERT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"Sir Julius Benedict, now seldom heard as a soloist, delighted the public once more by his arrangement of 'Where the Bee sucks.' He played upon a new Patent Grand by Brinsmead, possessing a remarkably loud and clear tone."—Echo.

"The upright Iron Grand Piano, with sostenente sounding-board, the mechanism produces the obvious result of a fuller and richer tone."—Morning Advertiser.

"Every means are adopted to insure the production of perfect instruments."—The Orchestra.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action

"Where all the pianos go to seems somewhat of a mystery, for a really good instrument will last a lifetime: and yet every year thousands are made by each of the great London manufacturers, while the numbers made by the 200 or more smaller firms must represent an enormous number in the course of each year. The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is produced than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.

"A perfect check, great power, and quick repetition."—Times of India.

"Produces a better quality of tone, greater durability, the new patent perfect repetition, with a check (never before attained), with the certainty of the instrument never blocking."—Land and Water.

"Beautiful, light, and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, the touch and facility of repetition are really perfect."—Belgravia.

"The advantages fully justify the term 'Perfect' Check Repeater Action."—John Bull.

"The touch is very sure, light, and elastic."—Musical Times.

"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.

"The latest and greatest improvements in the pianoforte."—City Press.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. On the Three Years' System.

"Receive the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

THE

(THE MOST PERFECT OF AMERICAN ORGANS).

The Name of "BURDETT" is a household word throughout the United States of America in connection with the higher types of the AMERICAN ORGAN, he having been the Inventor of almost all the special improvements which have raised the instrument above the level of the European Harmonium, and given to it its present artistic value. The same creative genius and practical skill still characterises all his productions, rendering the "Burdett" the most perfect representative of the American Organ in existence.

The Instruments can be seen and examined at the Central Depot for the United Kingdom, and Descriptive Illustrated Catalogues will be forwarded on application.

WORKS, LITTLE KING STREET NORTH, N.W., LONDON.

From ALFRED J. WHITE, Esq., Professor of Music, St. Austell, St. Ewe, Cornwall, February 7, 1878:—

Gentlemen,—I beg to acknowledge the safe arrival of the Harmonium, which gives great satisfaction, being in every respect all that I could desire, and the purchaser is thoroughly well pleased with it. I really believe you deserve liberal support both from the profession and the public at large for rendering them so good an instrument at such a moderate price, and you may rely upon my making known your firm to all who may inquire after the maker of a Harmonium of pure and rich tone, combined with excellent workmanship and moderate cost. As long as you continue to please me, so long may you rely on my entrusting to you the execution of any orders I may get.

Wishing you a prosperous year, very truly yours,
To Messrs. E. & W. SNELL. ALFRED J. WHITE.

Prices, Designs, Testimonials, &c., free of the Makers, as above.

GENTLEMEN,—The Harmonium gives the greatest satisfaction, and is really the best instrument I have fallen in with.—Yours truly,
W. P. M. SLATER.
39, Franklin Street, South Shields, May 6, 1876.

GENTLEMEN,—By a mistake in the address the Harmonium was left at a wayside station, so that I did not get it here till last night; however, it is uninjured and gives me every satisfaction. Its tone and workmanship are admirable, and in rapidity of touch it is quite equal to a large Alexandre Percussion instrument, on which I sometimes play. I shall always be glad to recommend your Harmoniums.—Believe me, faithfully yours,
W. F. ASHBRIDGE, M.A., Curate of Bessingby.
Bessingby Road, Bridlington, Dec. 15, 1876.

Mr. J. M. Boulard, Manager of the Alleghanians, Vocalists and Bell Players.

DEAR SIR,—The Harmonium you made for me in travelling case answers our purpose exceedingly well, and my company are all delighted with it.—Yours truly, J. M. BOULARD.
Sept. 16, 1876.

GENTLEMEN,—Kindly find cheque for the Harmonium to hand. I may add that our people are very much pleased with the instrument. It is a little gem.—Yours faithfully, J. W. H. WOOD.
Shirland and Higham School Board, Shirland, near Alfreton,
Feb. 2, 1877.

DEAR SIR,—The Harmonium arrived here yesterday. I am much pleased with it, and it is a very pretty, nice-looking instrument.—Yours truly, DAVID BRUCE
Merrington Vicarage, Terry Hill, Dec. 10, 1875.

GENTLEMEN,—The Harmonium arrived here in capital condition last week. I am very pleased with it. The tone is exceedingly sweet and pleasing. All who have seen it here like it very much.—Yours faithfully, H. R. HOLME.
Montserrat, West Indies, Aug. 11, 1876.

WARD'S
ROYAL PIANOFORTE AND HARMONIUM LAMP,
FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

By WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

Ich muss den Engländern ein wenig zeigen, was in dem "God save the King" für ein Segen ist. (I must show the English a little what a blessing they have in their "God save the King.")—BEETHOVEN'S Diary, 1813.

IT might have been hoped that the question of the authorship of "God save the King" would have been permitted to rest in peace for some years to come, but a curiously inaccurate letter addressed to the Times (February 1) by Lord Houghton has raised a storm of discussion in which all the absurd theories and statements of past years have been reproduced and re-aired, to the astonishment of the many, and to the amusement of the few who are familiar with the subject and its surroundings. So numerous and so phantomlike are many of the wild lucubrations referred to that one is forcibly reminded of the song sung by Timotheus in the ears of Alexander and the lovely Thais:—

> Behold a ghastly band,
> Each a torch in his hand!
> These are Grecian ghosts, that in battle were slain,
> And unburied remain
> Inglorious on the plain.

In May 1875 I contributed a paper on "God save the King" to the Concordia journal, briefly recapitulating some of the salient features of the various theories which had been promulgated, and also endeavouring to lead up to the conclusion that the music was probably originally a portion of some composition by Dr. John Bull, but that it was adopted and remodelled by Henry Carey to fit it to the words which form our National Anthem. Since the appearance of the article in the Concordia I have acquired additional, and, as I think, important, information, which I shall now make public, in the hope that it may do something towards laying the ghosts which still "usurp the time of night." But it will be necessary to begin at the commencement and tell the whole story. Some may ask whether the question is of sufficient importance, and be perhaps inclined to agree with the view expressed by a recent writer in the Pall Mall Gazette (February 7), who says, "The air is no more worth quarrelling about than are the words; the melody is poor and trivial;" but, encouraged by the opinion of Beethoven, as quoted at the head of this article, I shall endeavour to throw a little more light on the subject, and to show above all that the music, whatever its merits, is certainly the product of our native air and of native talent.

The muddle and almost hopeless confusion which has grown up in connection with the inquiry as to the origin of the music of "God save the King" is entirely due to the patriotic and well-meant endeavours of Richard Clark, a bass singer in the Chapels Royal, Westminster Abbey, and St. Paul's Cathedral, who died in the year 1856.

Unfortunately Clark was apt to dream romances, and not less persistent in his endeavours to prove them actual facts. He was the author of the well-known and oft-refuted myth respecting Handel's so-called "Harmonious Blacksmith" air; indeed in this instance he procured very weighty evidence in the shape of a ponderous blacksmith's anvil and hammer, evidence which he supposed would crush every argument and adverse fact; but mind proved superior to matter. Another instance of his proneness to romance was a supposed discovery that the catch "Jack, thou'rt a toper" was written by Tom Brown for Purcell, and bore references to the composer's presumed habits of dissipation, also to his friend and former master Dr. Blow, and to Purcell's wife. This bubble I have recently had the satisfaction to completely dispose of. Other myths of Clark's could be cited, but enough has been said to show that his statements must be read with caution and not accepted without proof.

In 1814 Clark published a work which now lies before me, entitled "The Words of the Most Popular Pieces performed at the Glee Club," &c. In the preface to this book he says, "Difference of opinion has prevailed in the musical world respecting the composition of the popular air and words of 'God save the King;' some account of both may not be uninteresting. Such as strikes the editor as worthy of consideration is submitted, and in the language of George Saville Carey, by whom it is given, in vindication of his father, for whom he claims the honour of this national song, and to which, it would seem, that he is justly entitled." Clark then gives a biography of Henry Carey,* and the son's vindication of his father's claims, in which all the evidence it was possible to adduce is brought forward to prove that Henry Carey wrote the music and words of "God save the King;" but the consideration of these claims we shall defer for the present. Clark concludes the special pleading on behalf of Carey with the following statement of his own: "John Ward speaks of 'God save the King' in his account of the Professors of Gresham College, published 1740, where he gives a catalogue of Dr. Pepusch's music as follows: 'No. xviii. 2 vols. 4to. Vol. I. folio 56. "God save the King,"' which is all that is there mentioned of it. It has been thought to be a variation of that gentleman's composed on the above tune, but the editor has not been able, at present, to meet with it." †

The above, as I have already stated, was published in 1814; eight years afterwards, in 1822, Clark published another book, called, "An Account of the National Anthem entitled 'God save the King!' with authorities taken from Sion College Library, the ancient records of the Merchant Tailor's Company, the old Checque-book of His Majesty's Chapel, &c. &c. &c. Selected, edited, and arranged by Richard Clark." In this book, which he dedicated to the "Master, Wardens, and Court of Assistants to the Worshipful Company of Merchant Tailors," he entirely discards his previous theory that Carey was the author of "God save the King," and boldly asserts that it was specially composed by Dr. John Bull for an entertainment given by the Company to King James I. on July 16, 1607. Clark proceeds to give various interesting extracts, one of them fully proving that Dr. John Bull performed on a "very rich pair of organs" before the King at that feast.

The account is taken from the ancient records of the Merchant Taylors Company, and runs as follows: "On Thursday, July 16, 1607, His Majesty King James the First, Prince Henry, and many honourable persons dined at the Merchant Tailors' Hall. . . . At the upper end of the Hall there was set a chair of estate, where his Majesty sat and viewed the Hall; and a very proper childe, well spoken, being clothed like an angel of gladness, with a taper of frankincense burning in his hand, delivered a short speech, containing xviii. verses, devised by Mr. Ben. Johnson, which pleased his Majesty marvellously well: and upon either side of the hall, in the windows near the upper end, were galleries, or seats made for music, in either of which were seven singular choice musicians, playing on their lutes, and in the ship, which did hang aloft in the hall, three rare men and very skilful, who song to his Majesty, and over the King, sonnetts, and loud musique, wherein it is to be remembered, that the multitude and noyse was so great that the lutes nor songs could hardly be heard or understood, and then his Majesty went up into the King's chamber, where he dined alone at a table which was provided only for his Majesty and the Queen (but the Queen came not), in which chamber were placed a very rich pair of organs, whereupon Mr. John Bull, Doctor of Music, and a brother of this company, did play all the dinnertime; and Mr. Nathaniel Gyles, Master of the Children of the King's Chapel, together with Dr. Montague, Bishop of Bath and Wells, and Dean of his Majesty's Chapels, Lenard Davis, Sub-Dean, and divers synging men, Robert Stone, William Byrde, Richard Granwell, Crie. Sharpe, Edmund Browne, Thos. Woodson, Henrie Eveseede, Robert Allison, Jo. Hewlett, Richard Plumley, Thos. Goold, William Laws, Elway Bevin and Orlando Gibbons, Gen. extraordinary, and the children of the said chapel, did sing melodious songs at the said dinner; after all which, his Majesty came down to the great hall, and sitting in his chair of estate, did heear a melodious song of farewell by the three rare men in the shippe, being apparelled in watchet silk, like seamen; which song so pleased his Majesty, that he caused the same to be sung three times over." "Dr. Bull, and Mr. Nathaniel Gyles admitted into the lyvery of this company. Also at this court the company have accepted and taken Mr. John Bull, Doctor of Musique, and a brother of this company, into the clothing and livery of the company. Also, they have accepted and taken Mr. Nathaniel Gyles, who hath his grace to be Doctor of Musique, and is Master of the Children of the King's Chapell, into the freedom of this society, and into the clothing and lyvery of the same; and it is ordered that they shall be placed in the lyvery next unto the Assistant; and note, that the lyvery-hoods were put upon their shoulders, but neither of them sworn; and the Company are contented to shew their favour unto them for their paynes when the King and Prince dined at their Hall, and their love and kindness in bestowing the musique which was performed by them, their associates, and children, in the King's chamber gratis: whereas the musicians in the great hall exacted unreasonable sums of the Company for the same, and therefore the Company mean not that this calling of Mr. Dr. Bull and Mr. Nathaniel Gyles into the Lyvery hath any burthen or charge unto them further than shall stand with their own good liking."

* A writer in the Times (February 15) asserts that Carey spelt his name "Cary:" I can affirm the contrary, having some hundred works published by himself. "Carey" was the spelling adopted by himself, his widow, and his son John Saville Carey.

† Mr. Southgate, in the Times (February 15), says, "A letter in the Gentleman's Magazine, 1816, first directed Clark's attention to Ward's 'Lives of the Gresham Professors.'" Clearly this is a mistake.

The foregoing account is taken from the Archives of the Merchant Taylors Company, and Clark supplements it with the following from Howe's continuation of Stow's "Annals:"* "The King, during this and the election of the new Maister and Wardens, stoode in a newe window made for that purpose; and with a gracious kingly aspect, behelde all their cerimonies: and being descended into the hall to depart, his majestie and the Prince were then again presented with like musique of voyces and instruments, and speeches, as at the first entrance. The musique consisted of twelve lutes, equally divided, 6 and 6 in a window on either side the hall, and in the ayre between them were a gallant shippe triumphant, wherein were three rare menne like saylors, being eminent for voice and skill, who in their several songs were assisted and seconded by the cunning lutanist. There was also in the hall, the musique of the city; and in the upper chamber, the children of his Majesties Chappell song a grace at the King's table, and whilest the King sat at dinner, John Bull, Doctor of Musique, one of the organists of his Maiesties Chappel Royal, and free of the Merchant Tailors, being in a citizen's gown, cappe, and hood, plaied most excellent melody upon a small pair of organs placed there for that purpose onely, concerning the bountie of the feast, and plentie of all things as well for pleasant princely entertainments of the King, the prince, the nobility, and the rest, where were very many braue courtiers and other gallants, as were most rare and excellent. The Company of Merchant Tailors also after that gaue very kind respect, with full and honourable reward unto every man, according to their highest measure of desert, that did them any service or kindness, either by voice or instruments, making of speeches, or setting of songs or otherwise."

Clark's comment on all this is: "Not one of the speeches, songs, sonnets, or music, that was performed at that great entertainment, is to be met with;" and yet he apparently believed the wholly unwarranted statement he was the first to make, that "God save the King" was composed for that particular occasion and then sung in Merchant Taylors' Hall. Clark's unproved assertion has been accepted with avidity, and frequently quoted as a fact, sometimes by gentlemen who from their position could have readily ascertained its worthlessness; the most noteworthy instance was on the occasion of the Prince of Wales dining with the Merchant Taylors Company, April 6, 1875, when the Master said, "Permit me to remind you that in 1607 Ben Jonson wrote, and Dr. John Bull added music to, 'God save the King.'"

As we have seen, the only approach to a particularisation of the music which was performed on the occasion of the banquet to King James is to be found in the word or title Grace. The identification even of this piece is quite impossible, although Clark argues that as Byrde was one of the singers, and also the composer of "Non nobis, Domine," it must have been his music which was performed. I confess I do not see the force of the argument.

We must return to Clark's book, and call attention to what he brings forward as a second proof that Bull composed "God save the King," in a succeeding article.

* Mr. Southgate quotes this passage as if from "old John Stow's annals:" an impossibility, as Stow died in 1605, two years before the banquet took place.

STERNDALE BENNETT'S PIANOFORTE MUSIC.

By H. H. Statham.

The contrast between the respect in which the works of Bennett are held by musicians and the more musically cultivated of amateurs, and the singular ignorance as to his claims to this respect exhibited by the numerous class who describe themselves as "fond of music," is not very difficult to account for. The composer belonged to that class of artists who are specially interesting to those who are, partially at least, artists themselves, in their feeling if not in their power of production. Ordinary listeners hear his praises with the same kind of curiosity with which ordinary novel-readers hear literary men speak of Jane Austen, or ordinary devourers of romantic poetry hear of Matthew Arnold. The "May Queen" has more in it that the popular mind can lay hold of than any other of his works, and accordingly to the average amateur

Bennett is the composer of the "May Queen." "The Woman of Samaria" the average amateur has heard, and thinks it "dry," the rather that he is told so by the papers. He feels, and so far feels correctly, that the weight and force of the great composers of Oratorio are not there, that he gets something different from what he expects when he goes to hear an Oratorio. He does not perceive that in this specialty, this "difference," lies the very interest and individuality of the work.

But the average amateur has at least heard of, and probably heard, the two works just named. What he has not heard, and what, strange to say, many musicians seem hardly to recognise, is that Sterndale Bennett left quite a large portfolio of solo pianoforte music of the purest and highest style, and which, in addition to its intrinsic beauty, has a special interest as illustrating the branch of the art to which the composer's own genius and predilection seem most to have turned; for he was more essentially a pianist and a pianoforte-writer than he was anything else, and his works of this class exhibit in a very marked manner the characteristics most essential to pianoforte writing, and which distinguish it from any other medium of musical expression. About these works, comprising more than thirty compositions, including four Concertos, a Sonata on a very large scale, and other very important productions, we propose to say a few words, in the hope of drawing the attention of the large class of pianoforte-playing amateurs to what they certainly ought to be more familiar with.

The first Pianoforte Concerto, which heads the list, and was written while the composer was still a pupil at the Royal Academy of Music, though already showing the hand of a master in its perfectly clear and finished form, and the perception of the genius of the instrument, which is evinced throughout it, is obviously written under the influence of Mendelssohn, then himself a young composer, whose new and fresh style was making itself felt as a model: the Scherzo Finale alone showing rather more of the influence of Beethoven. In short, the composer had not fairly come to his style in his first published work, as composers very seldom do; and both this and the next work, the Capriccio in D minor, dedicated to Cipriani Potter, would, as far as they go, give colour to the prevalent misconception that Bennett was only a kind of lesser Mendelssohn. Yet, even here, those who have become familiar with his matured style as a writer for the pianoforte will have no difficulty in recognising tendencies, both in regard to harmonic combinations and to the mechanical treatment of the instrument, which were afterwards to develop into characteristics of his style. The following passage from the slow movement of the Concerto, for instance—where the C of the horns is obviously the "root" of the pianoforte arpeggio commencing on D flat, shows already that leaning towards what may be called the "vertical" method of harmony which renders his writings such a mine of examples for modern musical theorists. Such a passage as this, from the first Allegro—shows already the preference for extended intervals in brilliant passages which contribute so much to the glitter (and difficulty) of his bravura writing. And, however he was dependent on Mendelssohn for his general inspiration in this first Concerto, he had already surpassed his model in a most important element of Concerto writing, the invention of effective figures for display of the instrument. The Rondo of Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto (which it is the custom to call the most important Concerto since Beethoven) will probably never fail to stir an audience with its gay and brilliant theme; but the "passages" in the whole Concerto are far less brilliant, as passages—far less original and varied in form—than those in this youthful work of Bennett's. The theme of the Capriccio in D minor, his next work, is one which almost every one would be inclined to set down to Mendelssohn—it has far too much of "mimicry;" but the composer's own manner begins to assert itself in the development of the movement, especially in a certain jocose vein peculiar to himself, of which the passage—

(to be played in a light, sharp, touch-and-go manner) is a specimen, and which crops up often in his later pianoforte writings, and scarcely needs the conventional direction "giocoso."

But a further consideration of Bennett's pianoforte compositions in their chronological sequence shows plainly that his apparent Mendelssohnian manner was only really a characteristic of his first works, before his true individuality had begun to assert itself. In fact, if he is to be compared with other composers, his affinity is much more with Mozart than with Mendelssohn. He is for the most part in a position of tacit protest against the modern orchestral treatment of the piano, the school of big chords and octave passages and the use of the pedal. He is too fond of the delicacies of touch and of phrasing to lose them in a battery of sound. And in regard to musical form generally, he is much more allied to the grace and finish of Mozart, expressed in purely abstract music, than to the imaginative and dramatic school. His view of his art intellectually seems to be much the same as that of Mozart: music is an art intended to give pleasure to the ear and the mind through melodies and proportions of tone-relation which are physically pleasing to the ear, and which suggest to the mind undefined ideas of grace and beauty and a certain harmonious fitness of proportion. There is a degree of poetic meaning or pictorial colouring at times, no doubt, which is essentially modern, and quite apart from anything possible in Mozart's day; but this is rarely allowed to disturb the purely musical form of the composition. The poetic idea furnishes a name for the piece, a sort of starting-point for the composer's idea, and that is all. This balance between the musical and poetic motive is beautifully illustrated in the slow movements of the Third and Fourth Concertos; the latter the well-known "Barcarole," the former the movement which he himself called the "Sleep-walking Scene." The suggestion in the latter case is interesting when we come to know it, but our enjoyment of the music is hardly increased by the knowledge; it is independent of any explanation, and carries its own meaning with it. The whole Concerto is a complete contradiction of what may be called the Mendelssohnian theory about Bennett, being in fact as much Mozartish in form as a composition could be which includes so many "modern touches" of harmonic combination and progression, and containing points in Mozart's own way which he might have gladly owned. The Fourth Concerto affords not even such points of comparison; it may be said to be purely Sterndale Bennett in feeling, style, and mechanical treatment of the solo instrument. And a noble and beautiful work it is, full of effective points in the combination of orchestra and piano, and written in the broadest and most elevated "Concerto style"—a style which, in its essential qualities, does not admit of too much of prettiness or sentiment, except in the slow movement, which is generally the portion where the sternest composer descends a little from the lofty pedestal of the broad Concerto style, and indulges his hearers with a little bit of romance; and how Bennett did this in the F minor Concerto we all know, for this movement at least has become almost of popular renown.

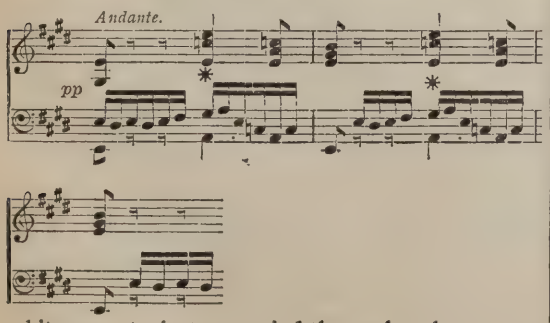
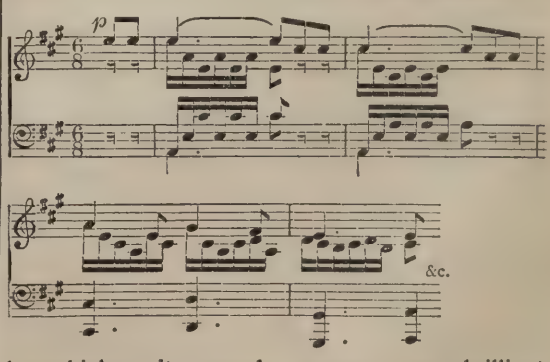
But our object here is rather to speak of the solo pianoforte music, which is mostly on a chamber scale, and within the reach of general players, than of the concert-room music. The next item is the "Three Musical Sketches," also one of the best-known works, probably in great measure through the pieces having distinctive titles (the "Lake," "Millstream," and "Fountain"), which remain in people's minds; though here again the music is in reality only nominally dependent on the suggested idea for its interest. Some additional suggestiveness is given by the title of the "Lake," perhaps, to the broad level character of this dreamy movement, and to the exquisite passage at the close, where the last undulations seem to die on the shore before complete calm ensues:—



a bit we quote just to remind the reader who remembers it of the effect of the happily placed G sharp against the chord of A minor at *, a cunning touch which the ear listens for with renewed delight every time it is heard. But the "Millstream" and "Fountain" are really studies in the Toccata style, and would be as charming without the names, the latter especially, which is said to have had a remarkable effect in the composer's own hands. It is seldom we meet with a bit of pianoforte music so sparkling and effective as to charm the dullest hearer, and at the same time so remarkable in its style and handling as to have interest for the most accomplished musician.

In the "Six Studies in the Form of Capriccios" there is not the least pretext at poetic meaning, and they are in form strictly what they profess to be, "Studies," having the essential element of the style of composition so called, i.e. a composition in which a certain difficulty of execution or expression is made the main feature of the composition, the perfect playing of which involves the mastery over that particular difficulty. Thus the first of these aims at the practice of passages in thirds, the second at legato playing, the fourth at "the cultivation of a characteristic and energetic style." How many of the young-lady amateurs of the day ever heard of these studies? How many could play them if they did? For though the pages seem to have very few notes on them compared with a great many more fashionable and, as is supposed, more brilliant compositions, they require more solid skill, for in Bennett's music you cannot miss a note—you cannot clap the pedal down and trust to producing a generally impressive effect; every note has its business to do, and must have impartial attention. You think they are "only studies"? Well, just play No. 2, and see if you know many things more melodious, expressive, and perfect. No. 1 looks "dry," does it? Get some one to play it for you who has a firm finger for "thirds" and a good left hand, and can work up the conclusion with the effect intended, and see if you think it dry at the close. Or look at the Fifth Study, "For tone and expression." It presents no mechanical difficulty; but, if you can play it through with all the delicacy of phrasing and the variety of tone and effect of which it is capable, you may call yourself something of a musician in feeling. But the whole set is no doubt a thing for people who take their playing seriously. Those who have been brought up on the sugar-candy of worthy Stephen Heller and his peers had best, perhaps, let Bennett alone.

The "Three Impromptus" (Op. 12) are among the composer's finest productions; the first one especially, in B minor, is a movement of which it is almost impossible to tire, so beautifully are sentiment and construction balanced throughout, so completely is passion wrought into artistic form. The "Allegro grazioso" (Op. 18) is also a very fine composition, commencing with this graceful and quiet subject:—



but which, as it proceeds, assumes a very brilliant character, and is full of impressive and striking points worked out in the most symmetrical manner, yet without the least stiffness or dryness, to its conclusion. A good performance of this movement is not easy for an amateur, but when attained cannot fail to interest and charm any really appreciative audience. This was followed by the Fourth Concerto; and next to the latter comes (Op. 22) the "Caprice for piano and orchestra in E," a very extended and brilliant movement in the Concerto style, and which perhaps would be selected if we were asked to pick out the work most characteristic of the composer among all that he has written, and most complete and finished in style: it is music impossible to connect for one moment with any name but that of its composer. The pianoforte part is marked by unusual force, brilliancy, and variety of effect, and the orchestral accompaniments are beautifully combined and contrasted with the solo instrument. It was concerning this composition that the Leipzig firm of publishers who purchased it wrote to the composer to say that he had left out the pianoforte part, which it turned out he had never written, having played it with the orchestra "out of his head"—a kind of feat which is spoken of as very extraordinary in the case of Mozart, by many who have not an idea that our own native composer could do things as wonderful.*

The "Suite de Piéces" (Op. 24) is another important work on a large scale, in which the composer anticipated the present fashion of reproducing this old form of pianoforte writing, but in a style far more classic and severe than is to be met with in any more recent attempt of the kind. The adequate execution of the first and the last two of these pieces (written for a gifted concert-player of her day, Mrs. Anderson) is very difficult; but the "Capricciosa in E," the "Allegro agitato in E minor," and the "Alla Fantasia in A" are within the reach of amateurs who love music combining learning and elevation of style with effect; the first named especially, in its combination of science and playfulness, is quite a gem in its way, and one of the most characteristic compositions of its author. The last remark may equally apply to the next two pieces on the list, the "Rondo piacevole" and the "Scherzo in E minor" (Op. 25 and 27). The Rondo has been recently played a good deal by able pianists (a beautiful execution of it by Miss Zimmermann, at a Crystal Palace concert, dwells in our memory), and it requires such to do it justice; for, graceful, flowing, and spontaneous as it sounds, attention of mind and accuracy of finger are taxed throughout it far more than in many works that sound more elaborate. The Scherzo is less difficult mechanically, but needs very keen perception of character and phrasing—we might almost say a degree of wit—on the part of the player to realise its expression. It well repays the trouble of study. Then we come to three little pieces, "Introduzione and Pastorale," "Rondino," and "Capriccio in A minor," published together as Op. 28—the latter remarkable for its individuality of character, the two former for simple grace and beauty. The Rondino is a very bright, rather Mozartish piece, the finish of which is elegance itself; but the Pastorale, which looks almost child's music in its simplicity, is the most remarkable for the poetic effect it realises through such simple means. We enter it, as it were, through a portal of rather stately phrases, till the Introduction leads us quietly down into some woodland recess, in which we may fancy a solitary figure playing dreamily on some old-fashioned wind instrument the melody which commences—and we imagine ourselves far away in some Arcadian landscape where existence is all an untroubled dream. If this little piece had been found among the old music-books of a century back, it would be considered a gem of expression and feeling; but then it is by an unpretending modern Englishman, who took no trouble to make friends with "the critics." What more need be said?

Nothing could be simpler, only every phrase and every note has its expression, and winds about our fancy, till the charm is complete at the passage (to be played slowly and lingeringly)—

We must pass hastily over some of the remaining works, noticing only, en passant, the two studies, "L'Amabile" and "L'Appassionata," Op. 29 (which again are really abstract compositions with fanciful titles), and the beautifully expressive and finished Rondo, "Pas triste, pas gai," in which the title really interprets the motive of the composition; the brilliant and spirited "Rondeau à la Polonaise," one of the most effective of the composer's pieces, but which takes some playing to give it its full effect; and the remarkable "Toccata in C minor," which became familiar to recent audiences in London through its introduction to their notice by a German pianist (Dr. von Bülow). The Romance, "Génévieve," is a "song without words" in a perfectly different manner from Mendelssohn's, and of a more severe and classic type of writing; and the "Minuetto espressivo" (which is honoured, we believe, by being adopted as a "good teaching piece") is one of the most graceful and attractive compositions of the kind, especially noteworthy for its admirable Trio, contrasting so effectively with the principal subjects. But a special word must be said in regard to the volume of short "Preludes and Lessons," composed for Queen's College, London, and which is really remarkable among music written for instruction on the pianoforte from its union of beauty and interest in the music with instructive value for forming the style of young players; and perhaps no book of the kind could be named more valuable in this combination of qualities. Each composition is prefaced by a short Prelude containing some special ornament of piano-playing which is to be mastered in it, and the one which follows it affords practice in a more sustained style; each piece again having its own object in regard to teaching some special lesson in execution and expression. Some of them are very short, but in the longer ones the young pupil has the pleasure of finding that, in learning the piece, he (or she) has not only made a step in mechanism and style, but has learned a little piece of music to which the best musician may listen with interest.

But now, at the close of our remarks, we have to notice a composition larger in scale than any other of the solo pianoforte works, and which seems to suggest a modification of our view of Sterndale Bennett's pianoforte music as being essentially abstract, and not poetic, or "programme," music. The "Maid of Orleans" is essentially a Programme Sonata, in reality and not merely in name, for it would unquestionably lose some of its meaning and beauty if we had not the key to it. The first movement would be an exquisite Pastorale in any case, but without the indication of its subject we should lose the meaning of that passage in which the future is so pathetically shadowed for a moment, as if a cloud came over the scene. The Battle Movement is wanting in coherence of form in comparison with many of the author's works, but this may have been intentional. He has seldom risen so high in dramatic force of expression as in this movement, with its contrasts of eager strife and tender regrets, its furious close, and the almost savage effect of the penultimate chord—showing what a composer of genius can do with a single chord well placed. The slow movement, the "Prison Scene," commences in a very quiet vein, but the passage from the point where the exquisite dream-subject is introduced up to the climax, ff, it may be fairly said is a piece of pathetic expression more intense than has often been realised in pianoforte music. And equally remarkable is the turn of the music at the passage which is obviously the bitter awakening—and the point of modulation at *, so telling in its effect. The last movement, "Short is the sorrow, endless is the joy," is the favourite with most who know the work; it is an exquisite interpretation of the mingled feeling expressed in the motto, rising to an almost ecstatic feeling towards the close (where it evinces great grandeur and breadth of treatment in the harmonies), but to our thinking is hardly so intense in expression as parts of the two middle movements.

The fact that Bennett had commenced a series of pieces illustrating the "Months," with mottos from English poetry, of which the two first, "January" and "February," have been posthumously published, shows that his thoughts had in the later period of his composition been turned towards programme music. But it may be doubted whether he would ever have been so entirely at home in this as in abstract music; and the fact that the "Months" were never completed seems to indicate that he felt this himself. It is obvious that in regard to style, as distinct from expression, he is less balanced in the "Maid of Orleans" Sonata than in some other works; but there can be no doubt that it will stand as an enduring work of genius on account of its intensity of expression.

In playing and studying his other works it must always be remembered that Sterndale Bennett aimed at a pure pianoforte style, and not at mere effect; that he expects a great deal from the player, and that every note must have its full value; and hence, to amateurs of the romantic school especially, the difficulty of his pianoforte music seems out of proportion to the result, in comparison with that of Schumann, Brahms, and others. "Passion" is what every one wants now, and this is not the most prominent element in Bennett's art (though he can be impassioned enough at times); and in his most characteristic music there is a peculiar bouquet, if one may so speak, a certain acid flavour, the enjoyment of which is to some extent a matter of temperament. Those, however, who do not estimate pianoforte music by the amount of sound which it extracts from the instrument, and who believe that clearness of form and balance of style are important elements in musical art, will find in the pianoforte music of Sterndale Bennett abundant matter for serious study, and for a pleasure more intellectual and more permanent than is to be obtained from any music which is inherently deficient in such qualities, whatever its other claims to consideration or to popularity.

MUSIC IN CONNECTION WITH DANCING.

By Charles K. Salaman.

With the decline of the Roman Empire the arts and literature languished and fell into a trance, so to speak, from which, for many ages, they were not awakened. Music and dancing were, however, in some measure preserved, albeit in a crude state, by the early Christians for devotional purposes, and were used in the Church. "Though modern ecclesiastical writers dissemble, or deny the use of dancing in the religious ceremonies of the Church," says Dr. Burney, "yet the numerous anathemas against it in the works of the Fathers are sufficient proofs that it had been practised among the primitive Christians, as well as by the Hebrews and pagans." St. Augustine, in his Eighth Sermon, thus preached: "It is better to dig or to plough on the Lord's day than to dance. Instead of singing psalms to the lyre and psaltery, as virgins and matrons were wont to do, they now waste their time in dancing, and even employ masters in the art." Le père Menestrier, referring to the religious dances of the ancient Hebrews, mentions that the choir is still retained in our churches for "that part of a cathedral where canons and priests sing and perform the ceremonies of religion;" and he further remarks that the choir was separated from the altar, and was elevated in the form of a theatre, being inclosed on all sides by balustrades. The term "choir" was used in two senses: as a company of dancers, and as the place in which they danced and sang. In Spain dancing and singing formed part of the religious services of the Church in Burney's time; and, strange as it may appear, at the Cathedral at Seville, even at the present time, on the Feast of Corpus Christi, and on each afternoon during the Octave, a number of choir-boys, magnificently dressed in the ancient Spanish style, perform slow and solemn dances before the Holy Sacrament, accompanied by voices and the organ.

Dancing in churches in France was abolished by Odo, Bishop of Paris, as early as the twelfth century. Up to that period it had been common; he had himself, he states, seen the canons on Easter Sunday take the choristers by the hand, and dance in the choir, while hymns of jubilation were sung. The Greek Church had retained many pagan rites, particularly that of carrying about the images of saints, whilst they sang and danced in procession. Singing and dancing were also permitted in the first performances in churches of Oratorios, or Sacred Dramas, or "Mysteries." Less than twenty years ago some travellers in the East reported that they had witnessed in a synagogue several grave-looking Rabbis, with the sacred scrolls of the law in their arms, solemnly dancing on the feast of Simchat Torah (the Rejoicing of the Law), while the congregation chanted appropriate psalms.

Burney traces some relics of the ancient dancing spirit in the continuous movements of the Roman Catholic clergy while performing mass. He says that it amounts to such a degree of gesticulation as the ancient Romans comprehended under the term Saltatio, or dancing.

Polydore Vergil mentions that the English people, as far back as 1170, celebrated Christmas Day with masques and spectacles, together with dancing, which was not the custom of other nations. Fitz-Stephen and old Stowe tell us that, in ancient London in the twelfth century, young maidens employed their leisure hours in dancing to the accompaniment of the cithern. The former writer, adopting the identical expressions of Horace, says, "Puellarum cithara ducit choros, et pede libero pulsatur tellus, usque imminente luna;" indicating that their performances were sometimes prolonged until night.

Spenser, in his "Epithalamion" (1595) has the following passage:—

> Harke! how the Minstrils gin to shrill aloud
> Their merry Musick that resounds from far,
> The pipe, the tabor, and the trembling croud,
> That well agree withouten breach or jar.
> But most of all the Damzels doe delite,
> When they their tymbrels smyte,
> And thereunto doe daunce and carrol sweet,
> That all the sences they doe ravish quite.

In his "Survey of London," Stowe, more than 400 years ago, informs us that after evening prayers it was customary for young damsels to dance before their masters and mistresses, while one of their companions played on the timbrel; and, in order to stimulate them to activity, garlands were "hanged athwart the street," which were afterwards bestowed as prizes upon those who had most excelled.

In the eighth century, and perhaps earlier, there flourished a class of entertainers who formed as it were a connecting link in the chain which bound the music and the dance of the ancient to the modern world, and who may be viewed as the rude conservators of those arts when the atmosphere of the literary and art world in Europe was obscured by the fog of superstition and ignorance. These persons were recognised under various appellations at different periods in different countries. The Anglo-Saxons called them Glee-men, and also Harpers (from gligg and harf, both Saxon terms for music, or minstrelsy and harp). They were known as Joculators, Jesters, and Jongleurs by the Normans. Their more general and comprehensive title was Minstrel. There were also women who practised dancing and music (under the designations of Glee-maidens, Female Minstrels, Tombesterres, Tymbesterres, and Saylors (from Salire, "to dance"). They could dance on their hands, as well as on their feet, and stand on their head, to judge by the delineations in the illustrated manuscripts in the Cottonian and Harleian collections, preserved in the British Museum. These were illuminated in colour and gold by Saxon and Norman monks during the period extending from the eighth to the fourteenth century. A beautifully illuminated manuscript of the early part of the thirteenth century, in the Harleian collection, represents a young woman, attired in ample drapery, in a very extraordinary posture, personating Herodias, tumbling, and balancing with her servant. A glee-man's dance of the ninth century is also represented in a similar manner in an illuminated manuscript. He is seen gracefully dancing to the accompaniment of a double flute and a lyre, performed upon by two musicians seated. Besides music, poesie, and dancing, glee-men, joculators, and other entertainers of the same order included among their professional avocations balancing, leaping, vaulting, tumbling, mimicry, and conjuring.

Minstrels were once supposed to limit their pursuits to music and poetry; but there is evidence that dancing was another of their multifarious accomplishments. "I remember," says Fauchet, in his "Origine de la Langue et Poésie Française," "to have seen Martin Baraton, an aged minstrel of Orleans, who was accustomed to play upon the tambourine at weddings. His instrument was of silver, decorated with small plates of the same metal [un tabourin d'argent semé de plaques aussi d'argent], on which were engraved the coats-of-arms of those "to whom he had given instruction in dancing."

M. Meusnier de Querlon, in his "Mémoire historique sur le Chanson," &c., in which he gives an account of the troubadours and minstrels of the middle ages, says, "On voit que le Chant et la Danse sont presque aussi naturels à l'homme que l'usage de parler et de marcher. La joie et la douleur sont actives, quelquefois même impétueuse. Elles éclatent comme malgré nous, soit par les accens de la voix, soit par les mouvemens du corps. C'est pourquoi la Danse et le Chant se trouvent établis par-tout où l'on trouve des hommes, chez les peuples moins polis, ou les plus sauvages."

An accomplished knight in the days of chivalry was expected to be well skilled in music and dancing. Sir Tristram, the "mirror of chivalrie," a knight of romance, is said to have "learned to be an harper passing all others; that there was none such called in any countrie." Of another imaginary hero of Poesie it is written, "He every day was provyd in dauncing and in songes, that the ladyes could think were convenable for a nobleman to conne; but in everie thinge he passed all them that were there." It will be seen from the subjoined extract from a pastoral poem written in the fifteenth century that the elegant accomplishments of the higher classes were also shared by the shepherds:—

> I can daunce the Ray; I can both pipe and singe
> If I were mery; I can both hurle and slinge;
> I runne, I wrestle, I can well throwe the barre,
> No shepherd throweth the axle-tree so farre.
> If I were mery, I could well leape and springe;
> I were a man mete to serve a prince or kinge.

A particular account of the troubadours and trovères does not come within the province of this subject, but it is undesirable to pass them by without observing that we are indebted to them for the preservation of music in the dark ages, and for many compositions in music and poetry of considerable merit. It is well known that among their illustrious companions the troubadours numbered kings, princes, nobles, and brave knights, to whom excellence in la science gaie was almost as much a matter of ambition as renown in war.

An essential condition of the dance is that its movements should be regulated by musical rhythm. If time be well marked by the beating of certain accented sounds on any instrument of pulsation or percussion, or by other means, tune is unessential as an accompaniment to dancing. It is hardly open to doubt that music, in its origin, was rhythmical. Dancing has been discovered among the most savage tribes, who mark their dance measures upon instruments which can give no tune, and to which melody is a stranger. Two pieces of wood struck together, or the beat of a drum, will serve to regulate the movement of dancers. It has been mentioned that the ancients sometimes struck oyster-shells and cockle-shells together, and clapped their hands and snapped their fingers to serve as rhythmic music. Savage tribes have always adopted this method. The Esquimaux, when they were first visited by Captain Parry, displayed a passionate liking for music and dancing; but, with the exception of a tambourine and a kind of drum, they possessed no musical instruments from which a tune could be extracted. They sang after their own rough manner, if the sounds which issued from their lips could be called singing. The aboriginal Mexicans delighted in dancing accompanied by their primitive rhythmical music, which they produced from various rude instruments of percussion, as well as from blowing through a kind of horn, pipes, small flutes, and sea-shells. Musical measure must have been well understood by the ancient Greeks and Romans, whose "lively airs" and "stirring tunes" have already come under notice; but the knowledge of it was probably lost with their music in the dark ages which succeeded the fall of the Roman Empire.

When Guido, the Monk of Arezzo, had invented the modern gamut in the eleventh century, the subject of musical measure came naturally under investigation, for without time the soul of music was wanting. Franco of Liége promulgated a musical time-system in the same century, which, after the lapse of 300 years, was improved by John de Muris in the fourteenth century.

On this subject Sir John Hawkins remarks, "If credit be given to the accounts of those writers who ascribe the invention of the Cantus Mensurabilis [or mensurable music] to Johannes de Muris, we shall be at a loss to account for the practice of regular dancing before the commencement of the fourteenth century; but if the Cantus Mensurabilis be attributed to Franco, the Scholastic of Liége, who flourished in the eleventh century, the antiquity of regular dancing is removed near 300 years farther back." It appears that certain learned Benedictines, the authors and compilers of "L'Histoire littéraire de France," discovered in the Abbey de Lira, in Normandy, a manuscript in folio, entitled "Ars Magistri Franconis de Musica Mensurabilis," whose author was proved to have lived to the year 1083; they have thus satisfactorily cleared up doubts which had long prevailed with respect to the invention of mensurable music before the year 1330.

The mist which had hung over the atmosphere of art and literature in Europe from the fifth century began to disperse about the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. It was indeed a glorious epoch for poetry, painting, and architecture when that marvellous galaxy of genius, Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Cimabue, Giotto, and Chaucer illumined the world. We know, principally through the medium of fiction, that in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, in Italy as well as in England, vocal and instrumental music and dancing were the recreations of all classes. From Boccaccio's "Decamerone" we learn that in Italy gentlemen and ladies in the fourteenth century played, sang, and danced. We read, "When dinner was over—as they could all dance, and some both play and sing well—the Queen ordered in the musical instruments, and commanding Dioneo to take a lute, and Fiammetta a viol, they struck up a dance, and the Queen, with the rest of the company, took an agreeable turn or two, whilst the servants were sent to dinner; and when the dance was ended they began to sing." And again, in the tenth novel, "And having supped with great cheerfulness and mirth, Emilia began a dance by the Queen's command, whilst a song was sung by Pampinea, the rest joining in a chorus;" after which "they sang many other songs also, and led up several more dances, playing divers kinds of music." We are left to conjecture what kind of music was sung and played. In default of information it may be presumed that the music alluded to by Boccaccio was that of the troubadours and minstrels, many specimens of whose pure melodies we possess, and deem worthy of admiration. Beside the lute and viol, the Corna-musa—the old Calabrian bagpipe—was among the instruments used to accompany the voice and dancing. Chaucer, no less graphic than his Italian contemporary, in representing the manners and customs of the various classes in England in the fourteenth century, tells us that music and dancing were common to all.

The "Yong Squyer,"

> He cowde songes wel make and endite,
> Justne and eek daunce, and wel purtray and write.

In "The Man of Lawes Tale" we read,—

> They ete and drynk, and daunce and synge and pleye.

The "Parisch Clerk" could sing and play on the Rebec, and

> In twenty maners he coude skip and daunce.

The "Prentys" could also play on the Rebec, and

> At every bridale wold he synge and hoppe;
> He lovede bette the taverne than the schoppe.

The musical instruments then in use in England were the harp, the psaltery, the fidel, the bagpipe, flute, trumpet, rote (or hurdy-gurdy), cruth, citole, rebec, gittern, regal, lute, organ, shawm, hautboy, horn, tabor, pipe, and drum.

After the coronation of Richard II., about 1340, the remainder of the day was spent in dancing and music. The king, the prelates, the nobles, the knights, and the rest of the company danced in Westminster Hall to the music of the minstrels.

There was a pastime in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries called "mumming" or "mummery," to which dancing and music were essential accessories. Those who actively engaged in these amusements attired themselves in masquerade costumes of various kinds, and, attended by minstrels singing and playing on different musical instruments, walked, danced, and rode in procession through the streets of London. A procession of mummers on a grand scale which took place in the metropolis in 1377 is quaintly described by Stowe in 1598. It was for the amusement of the young Prince Richard, son of Edward the Black Prince. The Venetian Ambassador accredited to the Court of Henry VIII. (1515-19) gives an account of a Court mummery that he witnessed at Cardinal Wolsey's palace, York House, Westminster, in 1518. He writes, "After supper a mummery, consisting of twelve male and twelve female maskers, made their appearance in the richest and most sumptuous array possible, being all dressed alike. After performing certain dances in their own fashion, they took off their visors. The two leaders were the King [Henry VIII.] and the Queen-Dowager of France, and all the others were lords and ladies, who seated themselves apart from the tables, and were served with countless dishes of confections and other delicacies. Having gratified their palates, they then regaled their eyes and hands, large bowls filled with ducats and dice being placed on the table for such as liked to gamble; shortly after which, the supper tables being removed, dancing recommenced, and lasted until after midnight." A state concert and ball given by Edward IV. and his Queen in 1467 are described in the Travels of a German named Tetzel, who was present in the suite of the Bohemian Ambassador. He informs us that the King's Singers sang after the dance, and he adds, "better do not exist." It is well known that Henry VIII. was a skilled musician and dancer, that he practised the virginal and lute by night and by day, and that he was indefatigable in "dancing and jumping" when young. The Viscount Chateaubriant, a courtier of Francis I., informs us that Queen Anne Boleyne, when she sang, would, "like a second Orpheus, have made bears and wolves attentive;" and he adds, "She likewise danced the English dances, leaping and jumping with infinite grace and agility." Unfortunately the Queen's music, although it could affect wolves and bears, had, it would appear, no charms to soothe the savage breast of her royal husband. A moralist of Henry the Eighth's reign, by name Thomas Elyot, published in 1534 a volume entitled "The Governor," in which he gives some curious particulars relating to dancing and music. He recommends the moderate exercise of those accomplishments in order, as he says, to "prevent the delicate and tender wit from being lulled or oppressed by continual study."

Music and dancing were held in high esteem, and were much cultivated by Queen Elizabeth and her loyal subjects. Paul Hentzner, the travelling tutor of a young German nobleman, in his "Itinerary," gives the following results of his observations of English habits in the sixteenth century. "The English," he says, "excel in music and dancing, for they are active and lively, though of a thicker make than the French." He tells his readers that outside the walls of the City of London there were theatres where tragedies and comedies were performed before large audiences, and that the acting was followed by the performance of excellent music, and a great variety of dances, which were much applauded. Laneham's description of the Kenilworth festivities provided by the great Earl of Leicester in 1575 for the entertainment of Queen Elizabeth is written in the broad Warwickshire dialect, and is alike amusing and interesting. He writes to a friend, a merchant citizen of London, "There was pleasaunt passing of the time with musicke and dauncing." "There was shewed before Her Highness [the Queen] by an Italian such feats of agility in goinges, turninges, tumblinges, castinges, hops, jumps, leaps, skips, springes, gaumbauds, somersaults, caprettings, and flights, forward, backward, sideways, dounward, upward, and with sundry windinges, gyringes, and circumflexions, all so lightly, and with such easiness as by me in few words it is not expressible by pen or speech." "I began to doubt whether he was a man or a sprite." In a letter written by James I. in 1623, he desires his children to cultivate music and dancing; he tells them to keep up their dancing privately, though they had "no other music for its accompaniment but to whistle and sing to each other."

Music and dancing were important features in the masques performed at Court in the early part of the seventeenth century. Those composed by Ben Jonson may be specially cited, being so precious both for the rare beauty of their verse and the bold descriptions in poetic prose of their action, scenery, and "business." These Court masques were arranged and designed in the most splendid and artistic manner, lords and adies of the highest rank taking part in them. The first two of Ben Jonson's masques, called the "Masque of Blacknesse," and the "Masque of Beauty," were performed with unusual magnificence in the years 1605 and 1608 respectively. They were personated by Queen Anne, wife of James I., and the lords and ladies of her Court, and great preparations were made for them. The "Masque of Blacknesse" represented the rivers Oceanus and Niger in human forms, with their surroundings of sea nymphs and sea monsters of various kinds, light-bearers, &c., grouped about inside and outside a huge pearl shell, the scene being the seashore. The masques comprised songs and dances, as well as dialogue. After an invocation by Æthiopia, commencing thus :—

Call forth thy honoured daughters,

&c., "the tritons sounded, and they danced on shore, every couple as they advanced severally presenting their fans, on one of which were inscribed their mixed names, on the other a mute hieroglyphic expressing their mixed qualities. Their own single dance ended, as they were about to make a choice of their men, one from the sea was heard to call them with this charm, sung by a tenor voice :—

Come away, come away,
We grow jealous of your stay:
If you do not stop your ear
We shall have more cause to fear
Syrens of the land than they
To doubt the syrens of the sea.

Here they danced with their men several measures and Corantos, all which ended they were again accited to sea with a song of two trebles whose cadences were iterated by a double echo from several parts of the land."

In the "Masque of Beauty" we read of the nymphs with their cupids being received by the Rivers. "These dancing forth a most curious dance, full of excellent device and change, ended it in the figure of the diamant, and so standing still, were by the musicians with a second song, sung by a loud tenor, celebrated." "The song ended, they danced forth their second dance, more subtle and full of change than the former, and so exquisitely performed, as the King's majesty (incited first by his own liking to that which all others there present wished) required them both again, after some time of dancing with the lords, which time, to give them respite, was intermitted with a song."

In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the ordinary time for the recreation of dancing, music, and other "idle pastimes," besides "dice and card-playing," was the afternoon of Sunday. Thomas Cartwright, in his "Admonition to Parliament," published in 1572, says, "He [the minister] posteth over it [the Church service] as fast as he can galloppe for eyther he hath two places to serve, or else there are some games to be playde in the afternoon, as lying for the whetstone, heathenishe dauncing for the ring, a beare or a bull to be baited." In the twenty-second year of Queen Elizabeth's reign she issued an edict to prohibit the performance of music, dancing, and plays in the City of London on the Sabbath; but this did not include their performances in the outskirts of the City, where the same pastimes continued to be enacted as heretofore, until a terrible accident occurred, by which many persons lost their lives, by the falling of a public building, which was considered to be a "judgment" of God. They were then forbidden, but ere long another royal proclamation was issued in the following terms: "It is our will that after divine service our good people be not disturbed, letted, or discouraged from any lawful recreation, such as dauncing [music] either for men or women."

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. III.—MOZART (concluded from page 74).

The letters written by Mozart in Vienna, during the most active and important years of his life, give us very little insight into his opinions on questions of art. They are mostly taken up—those at least which have come down to us—with personal and family matters, and, while interesting as throwing light upon his character as a man, they tell us comparatively little with regard to matters of graver consequence. Here and there, however, we get a glimpse of the master's views on topics connected with the business of his life, and no examination of his letters would be complete which ignored the fact. I have then a subject for a final article.

A careful reader of the letters can hardly doubt that Mozart, in his own view, was a writer of Operas first of all, and of anything else only in a sense subordinate. He rarely mentions his great works for the church, the orchestra, and the chamber; but of those for the stage he seems never weary of speaking. No sooner was one Opera out of hand than another was taken up, the whole energy and genius of the man being directed towards the branch of art which seemed not less to engage his sympathies than to be the readiest means of acquiring fame and fortune. It is natural therefore that we should look to the letters for a fuller exposition of his views on Opera than can be hoped for with reference to anything else. Nor are we disappointed.

On the question, so prominently put forward by Herr Wagner, as to the relative importance of poetry and music in lyric drama, Mozart held very definite opinions, by no means according with those of the Bayreuth reformer. Indeed, they are so remarkable that the whole passage wherein they occur is worth transcribing. Writing to his father while "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" was in progress, he said, "In Opera the poetry must necessarily be the obedient daughter of the music. Why do the Italian comic Operas everywhere please—with all their wretched poetry—even in Paris, where I myself witnessed the fact? Because music rules there supreme, and all else is forgotten. An Opera is certain to become popular when the plot is well worked out, the verse written expressly for the music, and not merely to suit some miserable rhyme (which never enhances the value of any theatrical performance, be it what it may, but rather detracts from it), bringing in words, or even entire verses, which completely ruin the whole ideas of the composer. Versification is, indeed, indispensable for music, but rhyme, solely for rhyming's sake, most pernicious. Those gentlemen who set to work in this pedantic fashion will always insure the failure both of their book and of the music. It would be well if a good composer could be found who understood the stage, with talent enough to make suggestions, and combined with that true Phœnix—an intellectual poet. Then no misgivings would be entertained about the applause even of the unlearned. Poets seem to be somewhat like trumpeters with their mechanical tricks. If we musical composers were to adhere as faithfully to our rules (which were very good at a time when no one knew any better), we should compose music as worthless as their libretti." The first doctrine here enunciated, viz. that poetry should be the obedient daughter of music is certainly a startling one, even to those who are not prepared to travel with Herr Wagner to the opposite extreme. But Mozart never hesitated to put it in practice. Writing to his father about the progress of the same Opera on another occasion, he said, "In the original libretto, Osmin has only one song and nothing else to sing except in the Terzetto and Finale; so now he has an Aria in the first act, and also one in the second. I have already indicated to Stephanie [the librettist] the words I require for that Air, the chief part of the music being finished before Stephanie heard a syllable on the subject." The clause I have put in italics shows beyond all dispute the remarkable fact that, not only did Mozart make poetry subservient to music, but that he sometimes wrote the music first, and had the words fitted to it afterwards. It must not be supposed, however, that Mozart was indifferent to the verbal text of his Operas; on the contrary, he paid it so much attention that the poets who worked with him found ample reason to complain of his constant suggestions and alterations. It was for this cause that the Abbé Varesco, who wrote the words of "Idomeneo," took offence; and for this cause also, when he consented to prepare the book of "L'Oca del Cairo," some years after, the collaboration was broken off, and the Opera never completed. Among other passages in Mozart's letters bearing on the subject of libretti there are two or three which should be quoted. On one occasion he writes, "A new Opera, or rather vaudeville, of Umlauf's has lately been given here, called 'Welche ist die beste Nation?'—a miserable piece, which was offered to me, but I would not accept it, saying that whoever composed music for it, without changing it entirely, ran a great risk of being hooted off the stage; and had it not been Umlauf's it would have been hooted, but, being his, it was merely hissed. This was not surprising, for even with the finest music no one could have tolerated such a piece; but, in addition, the music was so bad that I don't know whether the author of the poetry or the music should carry off the prize of inanity." Again, he says, "I have looked through a hundred libretti and more, but have not been able to find even one with which I am satisfied; at least so many alterations would be required that, even if the poet were to consent to this, it would be easier for him to write an entirely new one—always the better plan." On a third occasion, answering the dramatist Klein, who had sent him a libretto, "Rudolf von Hapsburg," Mozart said, "A man of such good judgment and great experience as yourself must know quite as well as I do that a thing of this kind must be read over again and again, not merely once but repeatedly, and with all possible attention and deliberation; and up to this moment I have not even had time to read it through without interruptions. All I can say at present is that I don't wish to return it to you, and that I beg you will entrust the piece to me for some little time." These are clearly not the words of a man who was careless as to the libretti he took in hand; wherefore the conclusion is justified that Mozart's views about the relative importance of the arts in Opera were based upon a principle deliberately accepted. In his "Opera and Drama," Herr Wagner represents the great master as utterly indifferent on the point where the letters show him to have been careful. He says, "Nothing is more characteristic of Mozart, with reference to his career as an operatic composer, than the careless absence of choice with which he began his works. He thought so little of reflecting on the fundamental æsthetic scruples of Opera, that it was rather with the greatest ingenuousness he set about composing the music of every Opera text proposed, actually indifferent as to whether the text was or was not a thankful one to him as a pure musician." It is impossible of course to reconcile this statement with Mozart's own words, "I have looked through a hundred libretti and more, but have not been able to find even one with which I am satisfied." Wherefore Herr Wagner is wrong. But the author of "Opera and Drama," without intending wilful misrepresentation, had an object in view when holding up Mozart as heedless what book he set to music. He wished to show the need for a real commingling of the genius of poet and musician by the example of those works of Mozart which have not kept the stage—works carelessly undertaken by the master, upon whom the poverty of the verse had a depressing effect. "Mozart," he tells us, "always composed music, but he could never write beautiful music except when inspired. Although this inspiration necessarily proceeded from his inward and peculiar powers, it only appeared bright and brilliant when fired from without, when the lovely object which, ardently oblivious of himself, he could embrace was displayed before the genius of the most divine love within him. Thus it would have been exactly the most absolute of all musicians, Mozart, who would long since have most satisfactorily solved for us the operatic problem; who would, namely, have assisted in producing the truest, most beautiful, and most perfect drama, had he but met with the poet whom he, as a musician, would only have been obliged to assist." I have nothing to urge against Herr Wagner's position at the present moment, except that it is not safe, in so far as it rests upon an assumption that Mozart ever set music to words and situations for which he had no conscious liking. The weight of evidence is entirely against such an assumption, especially as evidence is found in the letters written when "L'Oca del Cairo" was progressing. Mozart, for example, objected to the introduction of the goose. "I must candidly confess," he says, "that my only reason for not disapproving of this goose story altogether was because two men of greater experience and judgment than myself approved it. I allude to yourself [Leopold Mozart] and Varesco." He then goes on to point out how the plot may be changed with a view to "more natural effects," and adds emphatically, "I beg you will tell the Abbate Varesco very distinctly my opinion." In a subsequent letter he raised more objections, and was so far obstinate with regard to them that, as already stated, the whole enterprise fell through, and "L'Oca del Cairo" remained a fragment, reserved for the manipulation, in our own time, of M. Victor Wilder. Other instances might be cited, all pointing in the same direction, and tending to show that, while Mozart may have made, and actually did make, mistakes in the matter of libretti, he was far from being as reckless as Herr Wagner desires us to believe. One of these I cannot pass over. The librettist of "Die Entführung" had written a line thus: "Doch wie hui schwand meine Freude." Mozart took away the "hui" and substituted "schnell," remarking, "I don't know what our German poets think; even if they do not understand the theatre, or at all events Operas, still they should not make their personages talk as if they were addressing a herd of swine." Here is verbal criticism worthy of Wagner himself. A propos, let me point out that in another place the author of "Opera and Drama," eager to fling another stone at Meyerbeer, holds up Mozart as the great artist who wrote from his inspiration and never for the sake of effect. If this be so, how are we to explain the subjoined passage from Mozart's own hand, referring to the Terzetto at the close of the first act of "Die Entführung"? "Then comes the major at once, pianissimo; it must go very quick, and wind up noisily at the close, which is always appropriate at the conclusion of an act; the more noise the better—the shorter the better, so that the people may not have time to cool in their applause." Surely the conclusion of the whole matter is that Mozart's Operas fairly represent his principles and his predilections, and that whatever they embody—mistakes and all—comes down to us with the stamp of his deliberate approval.

As regards the care with which the great composer sought to express the dramatic situation, we find a very interesting passage in a letter referring also to the Eastern Opera. It is worth transcribing bodily: "In working out the Aria [Osmin's] I have given full scope to Fischer's fine deep tones to vibrate. The 'D'rum beim Barte des Propheten' is indeed in the same time, but with quick notes, and as his wrath gradually increases (when the Aria appears to be at an end) the allegro assai follows in quite another measure and key, which must insure the best effect; for, as a man in such a violent fit of passion transgresses all the bounds of order and propriety and forgets himself in his fury, the same must be the case with the music too. But as the passions, whether violent or not, must never be expressed so as to become revolting, and the music in the most appalling situations never offend the ear, but continue to please and be melodious, I did not go from F, in which the air is written, into a remote key, but into an analogous one, not, however, into its nearest relative, D minor, but into the more remote A minor. Do you know how I have expressed Belmont's Aria in A major, 'O wie ängstlich, O wie feurig!' and the 'throbbing heart'? By octaves on the violins. This is the favourite Aria of all those who have heard it, and mine also, and written expressly to suit Adamberger's voice. You hear the trembling, throbbing, swelling breast expressed by a crescendo, while the whispers and sighs are rendered by the first violins with sordini and a flute in unison." The chief value of this extract lies in its enunciation of the principle that music, even in its utmost exemplification of Sturm und Drang, must never be unpleasing. Mozart knew the full resources lying to his hand, and was perfectly well aware that all forms and degrees of expression were possible without breaking in upon this grand principle. Many of his successors, unfortunately, are in different case. Since Mozart's day the boundary separating music, which must please, from noise, which may distress, has been broken down, and composers, in the agonies of passion, go storming out into a veritable sound-chaos, crying, "Away with the tyranny of tone families." Poor Mozart! He only ventured from the minor of D to that of A. But even in our composer's day strange things were done by people eager for applause and not scrupulous as to how they got it. "The happy medium, truth in all things," complains Mozart, "is no longer either known or valued. One must write things so inane that they might be played on barrel-organs, or so unintelligible that no rational being can comprehend them, though on that very account they are likely to please."

In the course of our examination of Mozart's letters we have found ample evidence as to his sincere patriotism. He was a German of the Germans, proud of his nationality, and anxious in all ways to further its renown; naturally therefore he felt disgust at the small value set by the German Courts and aristocracy upon native talent, and at the preference shown to Italians. As Weber did after him, Mozart hated the Italians with a cordial hatred, not for their musical ability, but for the unscrupulousness with which they used the national gift of intrigue and cabal. Ah Sin is not more famous "for ways that are dark and for tricks that are vain" than, in Mozart's eye, were the ultramontane adventurers who swarmed in every German Court and city where there was anything substantial to be picked up. This feeling crops out now and then in the course of the letters. At one time we read, "A certain Abbate da Ponte is our poet here. He has at present a vast deal to do in theatrical revision, and must, per obbligo, write a new libretto for Salieri, which cannot be ready for a couple of months, and then he promises to write one for me; but who can tell whether he will or can keep his promise? You are aware that these Italian gentlemen are very civil to your face. Well, we know them. If he is in league with Salieri, I shall never while I live get a libretto from him." In another place the master, referring to Clementi, says, "He is a charlatan, like all Italians. He writes presto over a Sonata, and often prestissimo and alla breve, and plays it himself allegro in $\frac{4}{4}$ time. I know this to be the case, for I heard him do so." With equal bitterness the disgusted composer spoke of the neglect which left him to pick up a scanty living. "I believe I am fully capable of doing honour to any Court. If Germany, my beloved fatherland, of which I am (as you know) so proud, will not accept me, then in God's name let France or England be enriched by one more German of talent, to the disgrace of the German nation. You know well that the Germans are the people who have always excelled most in all the fine arts, but where have they laid the foundation of their success and fame? Not in Germany, certainly. Even Gluck—did Germany make him the great man he is? Alas! no. Countess Thun, Count Zichi, Baron von Swieten, even Prince Kaunitz, are all much dissatisfied with the Emperor for not more highly prizing men of genius, and for allowing them to leave his dominions. The latter, in speaking of me to the Archduke Maximilian, said, 'Such people only come into the world once in a hundred years, and must not be driven away from Germany, more particularly when we are so fortunate as actually to enjoy their presence in the capital.'" With the feelings which animated him, we are not surprised to find Mozart discussing the possibility of establishing a National Opera, as opposed to that which brought the Italians into his country. "Every nation," he exclaims, with more comprehensiveness than truth, "has an Opera of its own; why should not the Germans have one also. Is not German as well adapted for singing as French or English, and more so than the Russian? I am at present writing a German Opera for myself." Again, when writing to Herr Klein on this subject, he says, "I can give you very little intelligence as to the proposed German operatic stage, as everything is progressing very slowly, except, indeed, the building of the Kärnthnerthor Theater, which is set apart for this purpose. It is to be opened the beginning of October. For my part I don't anticipate its being very successful. To judge from the preliminaries, it would seem as if it were intended to deal a deathblow to the German Opera altogether (which has for some time been in a languishing condition), rather than to restore and cultivate it. My sister-in-law, Madame Lange, is the only one who has got permission to sing at the German Opera. Cavalieri, Adamberger, Teyber, all Germans of whom Germany may well be proud, must remain at the Italian Opera, and are thus compelled to enter the lists against their own countrymen. . . . The Italian company do not require them, for, as far as numbers go, they can play without any foreign aid. The idea at present is to make use of actors and actresses in the German Opera who only sing when absolutely required. Most unhappily, the directors of the theatre, as well as of the orchestra, are to be continued in office, who by their ignorance and inefficiency have most of all contributed to the destruction of their own work. If there were even one good patriot on the same raft, the affair would soon assume another aspect. In that case, perhaps, the fair-budding National Theatre might one day burst into blossom. It would be thought an everlasting blot on Germany if we Germans were ever really to begin to think in German, and to act like Germans, to speak German, and above all to sing in German!!! Do not take it amiss, dear sir, if in my zeal I may have gone perhaps rather too far. Fully persuaded that I am addressing a true German, I have allowed my tongue free course, which I can, alas! so seldom do that, after each such outpouring of my heart, I might boldly venture on an extra libation without injury to my health." How all these remonstrances and speculations ended need not be said. For one great work written in German, Mozart composed two in Italian, and the task of setting up a National Opera devolved upon others.

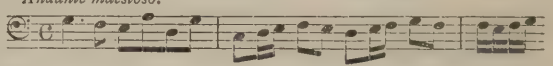
Every amateur knows that during the later period of his life Mozart's love for purely contrapuntal music became almost a passion, a fact curiously illustrated by the combined Chorale and Fugue in "Die Zauberflöte." This development seems to have arisen out of the composer's acquaintance with Baron von Swieten, a devoted admirer of Handel and Bach, whose works were frequently performed at his house. "By-the-bye," writes Mozart to his father, "I must ask you, when you return me the Rondo, to send me also the six Fugues of Handel, and Eberlin's Toccatas and Fugues. I go every Sunday, at twelve o'clock, to Baron von Swieten's, where nothing is played but Handel and Bach. I am now making a collection of the Bach Fugues [Sebastian], and also those of Emanuel and Friedemann Bach, and likewise of Handel." In a subsequent letter to his sister we find a full account of the first pianoforte Fugue committed to paper by the master—that which has a subject as follows:—

Andante maestoso.



He says, "I inclose a Prelude and Fugue. . . . My dear Constance is, in fact, the origin of this Fugue coming into the world. Baron von Swieten, to whom I go every Sunday, gives me all Handel's and Sebastian Bach's Fugues (after I have played them to him) to take home with me. When Constance heard these she fell in love with them at once; she will listen to nothing but Fugues, and particularly the works (in this style) of Handel and Bach. As she often heard me play Fugues, out of my head, she asked me if I never wrote them down; and when I said I never did, she reproached me for not having composed this most artistic and beautiful style of music, and never ceased her entreaties till I wrote a Fugue for her. So this is its origin. I have purposely timed it andante maestoso, that it may not be played too quick; for if a Fugue is not rather slowly played, the subject, as it comes in, cannot be distinctly and clearly heard, and thus naturally produces no effect. In the course of time, and when I have a favourable opportunity, I intend to write five others, and present them to Baron von Swieten, whose collection of music, though small in quantity, is good in value." The opportunity never seems to have come, but Mozart's suddenly awakened passion for contrapuntal writing influenced all his future works of importance, and culminated in the glorious Finale to the "Jupiter" Symphony.

Clementi's arrival in Vienna, and the distinction with which he was received, naturally had an effect upon Mozart, but not from any sense of inferiority as a pianist. As a matter of fact the German master entertained something like contempt for his Italian brother. In one letter he says of him, "Clementi plays well, as far as execution with the right hand goes. His greatest strength is his passages in thirds, but he has not an atom of feeling or taste; in short he is a mere machine." Again he writes, "As to Clementi, he is a good player, and when this is said all is said. He has great facility with his right hand; his principal passages are thirds; but in other respects he has not an atom of taste or feeling, all is mere mechanism." And yet again, "I must here say a few words about the Clementi Sonatas. Every one who either hears them or plays them must feel that as compositions they are poor enough. They contain no remarkable or striking passages, except those in sixths and octaves; and I beg my sister not to practise these too much, that she may not disturb her quiet even touch, nor injure the natural lightness, facility, and smooth rapidity of her finger. For, after all, what is to be gained by it? Supposing you do play the sixths and octaves with the utmost velocity (which no man, not even Clementi, can thoroughly accomplish), you produce an unpleasant scramble, but nothing else in the world. . . . What he [Clementi] really does well are his passages in thirds, but he laboured at these day and night in London. Except these he can do nothing, absolutely nothing; for he has not the slightest taste or execution, far less feeling." Mozart, as has already sufficiently appeared, was in the habit of speaking about his contemporaries with plainness, but there were times when he was just as earnest in praise. In one letter we read, "Some Quartetts have just come out by a certain Pleyel, a pupil of Joseph Haydn's. If you do not yet know them, you ought to try to get them, for they are worth the trouble, being very well composed and pleasing: you will at once recognise his master by the style of the music. It will be a good and happy thing for music if Pleyel, in his day, is able to supply Haydn's place among us." These generous words may fitly be supplemented by those in which the master dedicated to Haydn his six famous Quartetts: "Be pleased to receive them kindly, and be to them a father, a guide, and a friend. From this moment I transfer to you all my rights over them, but I entreat you to look with indulgence on those defects which may have escaped the too partial eye of a parent, and, in spite of these, to continue your generous friendship towards one who so highly appreciates it, and, in the meantime, I am, from my heart, your sincere friend."

Here I leave the Mozart letters, satisfied if, through them, the illustrious master has been brought, in his very self, nearer to the readers of this journal.

BEAUMARCHAIS AND WAGNER.

A strange but not unexampled association of names heads this article. When all the world was talking of Wagner's theatre at Bayreuth the poet-composer found himself placed in juxtaposition with no less unlooked-for a man than Grétry. Wagner built a house which the Frenchman had anticipated long before, and as the fact was pointed out, wise men reflected upon the truth of the proverb that "there is nothing new under the sun." After Grétry and Wagner, why not Beaumarchais and Wagner? Let us see if there be in history any reason for the connection.

In the preface to his poem, "Tarare," set to music by Salieri, the great dramatist reveals himself to us as an earnest and audacious reformer of Opera. Not only so, but, adopting and carrying further the ideas of Gluck, he developed a scheme having a singular analogy to that advocated by Wagner. In the first place Beaumarchais would discard the word "Opera" altogether. So would Wagner; he distinctly tells us that his works are not Operas. Then, for "Opera," Beaumarchais desired to substitute "melodrame," which is only another form of the "music-drama" of his successor. Here is a strong point of affinity to start with. But we find one more remarkable still in the theory advocated by the French dramatist, which may be thus summarised: first, an intimate alliance of all the arts necessary to Opera; second, an absolute agreement of the musical expression with the dramatic situation or sentiment; third, the desirableness of marvellous elements in the story; fourth, the whole work to be dominated by a philosophic or religious idea; fifth, absolute fusion of voices and orchestra, of the word and the tone. All these points are touched upon by Beaumarchais with perfect clearness. For instance, after naming the arts necessary to Opera, he says, "The true order of these arts should be, as I think, the following: first, the piece, or invention of the subject, which comprises the main interest; then the workmanship of the poem; then the music, which is but a new expression of the verse, lastly, the dance, which by its grace and gaiety gives warmth to unexciting situations." On the second of the points named above as comprised in his theory Beaumarchais observes, "The music of an Opera is only an embellishment of the text, which it ought not to abuse. If a musician possesses true talent, if he reflects before writing, he will feel that his duty (and his success) consists in expressing the poet's thoughts in language more harmonious—to give them greater force, and not to create anything apart from them." Here it may be pointed out that, just as Wagner prohibits the repetition of words, so did Beaumarchais. In the preface to the "Barbier de Seville," he remarks, "We shall use dramatic music seriously at the theatre when it is felt that one sings there only in order to speak, when our musicians are en rapport with nature, and above all cease to impose upon themselves the absurd rule of always returning to the first part of an air after completing the second. Are there any repeats or rondos in the drama? This cruel radotage is the death of interest, and denotes an insupportable emptiness of ideas. In effect, if declamation be an abuse of narration at the theatre; singing, which is an abuse of declamation, becomes, as one must see, the abuse of an abuse. Add to this the repetition of phrases, and where is interest?" Further on we see that Beaumarchais contended, precisely as does Wagner, for perfect harmony of feeling and object, instead of rivalry, among the constituent elements of an Opera. "If the soul of the musician," he observes, "has entered into that of the poet, and in some sort espoused it, all the executants ought to occupy towards each other a similar relationship. From their union will come pleasure, just as from their separation arises weariness." With regard to the entry of the marvellous into operatic story, we again find the French dramatist anticipating his German successor. He believed that dramatic music should find its subjects in myths and legends, and that, as already stated, some powerful idea, religious or philosophical, should be illustrated. Among other things on this subject he says, "I am of opinion that one ought to take the mean between legend and history. I cannot help perceiving also that highly civilised manners are too methodical for dramatic purposes. Oriental manners, less regulated and known, leave the imagination a freer field, and appear to me better suited." Much other might be quoted, but enough if the intelligent reader sees clearly the remarkable points of unity between the author of "Le Mariage de Figaro" and him who gave us "Der Ring des Nibelungen."

As the theories of Beaumarchais were expounded in the preface to "Tarare," we naturally look to that Opera for their illustration. There can be no doubt that the dramatist intended this work to mark an era in the history of the lyric stage. He was himself somewhat of a musician, and, according to "Les Mémoires Secrets," could compose in a manner fort agréable. But he shrank from filling, like Wagner, the double rôle of poet-composer, and in the first instance applied to Gluck for the music of "Tarare." Beaumarchais admired Gluck extremely. On hearing the German master's first French work he exclaimed, "Behold a man who understands the stage! Behold a talent truly dramatic!" His resort to Gluck was therefore almost a thing of course, apart from the position occupied in general esteem by the author of "Armide." But the master had become too old, or thought so, for the proposed task, and suggested that his disciple Salieri should undertake it. To this Beaumarchais, who admired the disciple also, willingly consented. The libretto, however, was not handed over to be done with as the musician pleased. Beaumarchais, true to his theory, resolved that, if he could not write the music himself, the work should go on under his very eyes. Wherefore Salieri was taken into the dramatist's own house, and lived with him in intimate communion, their Opera being, we are told, "the creation of one mind animating two persons." Salieri himself has given us a glimpse of his life at this time. Writing to the daughter of Beaumarchais as late as 1805, he says, "You are still before my eyes, madame, the lovable child, the pretty Eugénie, full of spirit and grace. . . . We two are, in the afternoon, playing Sonatas à quatre mains. At two o'clock M. or Madame Beaumarchais enters the room and says, 'Now to dinner, my children.' We dine; I walk, read the Gazette, or go to some theatre, and return early. When M. Beaumarchais is not in I return to my room on the second floor. . . . Towards ten o'clock M. Beaumarchais comes to me. I sing to him what I have written of our grand Opera; he applauds, encourages and instructs me in the most paternal manner. All appeared so tranquil." "Tarare" was soon finished under these pleasant circumstances, and put in rehearsal at the Académie. And now again we see a foreshadowing of Wagner, this time in the prodigious individuality of Beaumarchais. Salieri was nowhere, his colleague everywhere. "It is M. Beaumarchais," say "Les Mémoires Secrets," "who makes all the observations, even on the music, which, he pretends, serves only to set forth the beauties of the poem. He often shouts to the orchestra, 'Pianissimo. I wish, Messieurs, the words to be dominant, that none of them may be lost.'" At Bayreuth Wagner insisted that nobody should be present at rehearsal save those engaged, but had, finally, to give way. So did Beaumarchais insist before him, and with a like result; but in his case the curiosity of the public arose partly from a desire to see him at work, "shouting, gesticulating, and exercising over all, even the composer, a tyrannical authority." At the first performance loud calls arose for Beaumarchais, but the dramatist absolutely refused to appear, and the public had to be content with applauding Salieri, who was seized by the actresses and literally carried upon the stage. Herr Wagner, it will be remembered, though not so obstinate as his predecessor, declined for a long time to show himself before the curtain at the production of "Der Ring des Nibelungen." Finally, and by way of completing the parallel, the great work of Beaumarchais and Salieri was abused by the critics as persistently as that of Wagner. "Tarare," according to the Paris press, presented a monstrous example of extravagance and folly? Will the parallel go further? "Tarare," ninety years after its production, is dead. Where will the "Nibelungen" be ninety years hence?

On the 12th ult. the blows of Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's hammer put an end for ever, let us hope, to the system of which the notorious Mr. H. Wall was, not long ago, so formidable and vexatious an embodiment. Mr. Wall, it will be remembered, professed himself to be a Society for the protection of all and sundry the rights of everybody who had literary or musical property open to depredation, but he principally guarded those of Mr. Frank Bodda and Madame Bodda-Pyne. Whether the lady and gentleman in question found their property troublesome under the circumstances we know not, but at any rate they put it up to auction as aforesaid, and it is now scattered over London, the "very considerable income" it produced being destined henceforth to benefit a variety of people. Among the performing rights sold were those (words and music) of "Lurline," bought by Messrs. Hutchings and Romer for £130; of the "Bohemian Girl" (words only), which fell to Messrs. Chappell and Co. for £160; and of the "Puritan's Daughter" (also words only), secured by Messrs. Hutchings and Romer for 25 guineas. The two Songs from "Maritana," "In happy moments" and "Scenes that are brightest," in respect of which Mr. Wall kept such a sharp look-out, fell to Mr. Brewer (words only) for £62; while three bids of five guineas each from Messrs. Chappell secured the right of performing, as to their words, Balfe's "Enchantress" and "Daughter of St. Mark," and two interpolated songs, "The Muleteer" and "O whisper what thou feelest," in the "Crown Diamonds." Looking at the character of the firms into whose hands the rights aforesaid have fallen, one thing is safely to be anticipated, viz. that professionals and amateurs may perform anything they please out of the works named free from dread of an action at law. It is to the interest of publishers—and so much to their interest that no money received as "fees" can be an equivalent—that the music they issue should be as widely known and extensively used as possible. Hardly, therefore, will Messrs. Hutchings and Romer or Messrs. Chappell employ another Mr. Harry Wall, assuming the existence of another, to watch concert programmes and pounce upon any unfortunate who may try to win applause by singing "Sweet Spirit, hear my prayer," or "O whisper what thou feelest." In the catalogue of the sale, besides the notorious "rights," were the band and chorus parts of some twenty-six Operas, and the stage jewellery, &c. used by Miss Louisa Pyne during her operatic career, including the drum of the Daughter of the Regiment, which was bought for twenty shillings. The jewellery all fell to Mr. Jarvis for some £35, the most interesting "lot" being a pair of robe clasps said to have been worn by Mrs. Siddons as Queen Katherine, and now sold for £5.

The keen competition which exists in journalism, as in all other forms of labour and enterprise, sometimes leads to singular measures for getting or keeping readers. In one place prizes are offered for solving conundrums; in another the purchase of a single copy entitles the purchaser to buy a cheap opera-glass; and in a third the chance is held out of obtaining "a piano for five shillings." But the most complete thing of the kind was achieved the other day by the Cardiff Times, which offered a series of "commemoration prizes" for excellence in a variety of literary and artistic forms. There was a musical competition of course, and Mr. Brinley Richards, always ready to labour for his countrymen, undertook the thankless task of adjudicator. Of the Psalm-tunes sent in Mr. Richards speaks highly, and points out "the refinement of the melodies, and the admirable manner in which they are harmonised," adding that "there are some not unworthy of comparison with the best examples of their kind." Furthermore, we are told, with pardonable boasting, that, assuming the compositions to be the works of amateurs among the population, it is doubtful whether the result "would have occurred in any other part of the kingdom." The songs with pianoforte accompaniment were not so fortunate, Mr. Richards opining that the composers laboured under the disadvantage of want of experience as pianoforte players; but the successful part-song is described as "noticeable for its flowing melody and compact harmony." On the whole, Mr. Richards believes that if his countrymen enjoyed the advantages of a thorough musical education they would be able to vindicate their claims in the higher branches of art. If the Cardiff Times has been instrumental in making this ever so little clearer to rich Welshmen, it has done a good work. That the Welsh have music in their nature none who know them can dispute, and it is just because no higher musical education is available in their own country that they never—except in rare instances—get above elementary forms of the art. There ought to be a Welsh Musical Academy in London, supported by the Principality, and made strictly national, in order that it may appeal to national pride. Then the Muse of the "ancient mountains" would perhaps learn to sing a loftier strain than a folks-song.

It has been truly said that only a rich man can afford to dress shabbily. May it not also be affirmed that only a country rich in representative men of art and science can afford to allow the names of some few to fall into almost utter oblivion? We know, for example, that Germany—the recognised birthplace of the most profound in musical thought—has but lately resuscitated the greatest works of some of her most gifted composers; but does England stand so high as a musical nation that she can ignore a genius like Purcell? If any one still doubt that this has been the case, let him refer to a recent article in a morning contemporary, in which this composer's once popular Duet and Chorus, "Britons, strike home," is treated, for political purposes, as a "Prophetic War-song," the origin of which is perfectly unknown, and which the writer has seen, evidently for the first time, in a version "Printed and sold by J. Pitts, Great St. Andrew St. 7 Dials." We are glad to find that a correspondent immediately wrote to the paper in which the discovery of this composition was announced, saying that "the words are from the Opera of 'Bonduca,' which was adapted from Beaumont and Fletcher's tragedy by Betterton," and that the music is by Purcell. He also states that the writer of the article "is quite right in supposing that the song could not have been written less than seventy years ago;" but that "at least one hundred years may be added to his estimate of the antiquity of this 'War-song,' for the Opera of 'Bonduca' was written in 1695, in which year Purcell died." It is to be hoped that the attention drawn to the works of our great national composer by the establishment of the "Purcell Society" may shortly dispel the ignorance of Englishmen as to his claims upon their sympathy; but meanwhile we cannot but wonder that a writer on the staff of a newspaper should not only be unaware that Purcell composed "Britons, strike home," but that (considering the composition was published in the Musical Times of June 1865) he should never have met with even the words save in the "7 Dials" edition from which he quotes.

It is difficult, we know, to do more than "request" ladies and gentlemen to refrain from annoying others in public assemblies. Visitors are "requested" not to crowd before a picture at an exhibition; concert-goers are "requested" to be seated before the commencement of the music, and only to leave the room between the movements of a piece. But those who ostentatiously indulge in the most intolerable of all nuisances at an Opera-house have not, so far as we are aware, ever yet been even "requested" to desist. We allude to the practice of keeping up a running conversation during the performance of an Opera. Whether a large number of the audience surrounding us at the Adelphi Theatre, on the opening night of Carl Rosa's Opera Company, met together for a friendly chat after dinner, or they had entered into a compact (as opponents of Opera in English) to prevent anybody from hearing what they did not wish to hear themselves, we know not; but anything like the din kept up throughout the Opera of "The Merry Wives of Windsor" we never before heard. They talked during the Overture; they talked through the beautiful opening Duet; they talked through the soprano solos, and screamed almost when a crescendo in the music interfered with their hearing each other. Stern looks were directed into their boxes; even appealing glances from music-loving ladies gently rebuked their loquacity; but they had paid for their places to talk in, and remained inflexible to silent admonition. Now we have often seen a person who insists upon interfering with the comfort of his neighbours at a theatre quietly ejected from the building. Would it not be possible, after paving the way by the usual "request" in the bills, to have some official in the establishment who should be authorised to enforce silence? Surely there can be no reason that order should reign in the gallery, and disorder in the boxes. We do not wish to compel any persons to listen to the music, but have a right to claim at least common courtesy towards those who do.

Some time ago we recollect that a proposition for licensing street music was favourably entertained, and there appeared every probability that this measure would be carried into effect. We confess that to us the project appeared simply absurd; for, apart from the difficulty of deciding what kind of music should be considered legal, we can scarcely be expected to endure with placidity a succession of sounds which disturb us from study or repose because those who blow or scrape them are "licensed." A recent decision by one of our metropolitan magistrates, however, has rendered it unnecessary for the guardians of peace and quietness to legislate at all upon the matter, for he has discharged two Italians, who were brought before him for refusing to desist from performing, because the person who complained of the annoyance was "dressing." Of course we know that with many persons this is an exceedingly delicate operation. Beau Brummell, for instance, when asked what all the unsoiled cravats which were heaped up in his dressing-room were for, replied that they were "his failures;" and who knows but that the sudden sound of music in the street might often produce the most lamentable results when just giving the finishing touch before a looking-glass? But it is useless to complain, for the fiat has gone forth; and henceforward we should recommend nervous residents in a "quiet street" to endeavour as much as possible to keep the hour at which they are accustomed to dress a profound secret, for they may rest assured that the wily "Italians" will be on the watch. We should like, however, as police magistrates have now constituted themselves judges in the matter, to be furnished with a list of the occupations in which we are permitted to indulge without the accompaniment of music; for we can scarcely be expected to keep within the law unless allowed to become thoroughly acquainted with it.

If anything were wanting to crown the folly of the encore system we could find nothing more decisive than the fact that comes to us from St. Petersburg, that, during a performance of "Lucia" at the Imperial Opera, Mdlle. Etelka Gerster was so rapturously applauded that she "had to sing the whole of the mad scene over again." This may be very gratifying to the vocalist, and the announcement of such an occurrence may act as an excellent advertisement; but, in the cause of art, we ask where is this absurdity to stop? If, instead of a single piece, we are now to have a whole scene repeated, why not a whole act, or, indeed, why not the entire Opera, supposing that enthusiastic admirers can be found to retain their places far into the small hours of the morning? We have often before alluded to this grievance; but it is the duty of all who are earnest in endeavouring to reform an abuse not to cease agitating the subject until they have succeeded in their object. True it is that in this country artists are scarcely as ready to accept encores as they used to be; but the custom still lingers, not only at Ballad Concerts, where the nuisance is more endurable, but at those classical performances which are presumed to lead, and not to follow, the taste of the day. Experience has proved that to leave the matter in the hands of those who are personally interested in upholding the system is useless. A line in programmes, both of the Opera-house and concert-room, that "no encores will on any account be allowed" would at once root out the custom; and it would be well, we think, at once to arm Conductors with authority to resist the clamours of those who, knowing that the artists themselves are on their side, persevere in enforcing their demands, although obviously against the better sense of the majority of the audience.

The "first-class pianiste and vocaliste" who places "M. and A.C.P." after her name (to whom we alluded in an occasional note last month) has written to say that the letters indicate "Member and Associate of the College of Preceptors." Our correspondent also takes the opportunity of telling us that she thinks her claims should be "courteously challenged and investigated;" but, as we have not challenged them, we are not called upon to investigate them. We merely expressed our ignorance of what the letters mean, and are perfectly satisfied with her explanation.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

The short season of Operas in English at this establishment terminated on the 13th ult., the success of Sir Julius Benedict's "Lily of Killarney" having induced Mr. Mapleson to prolong the performances three nights beyond the period originally announced. We must also mention that Mdlle. Hélène Crosmond met with a cordial reception as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust," both her singing and acting suggesting the most sanguine expectations for the future. We understand that the lessee intends very shortly to commence his Italian Opera season.

ADELPHI THEATRE.

The commencement of Mr. Carl Rosa's Opera season at this establishment on the 11th ult. was in every respect a brilliant success. That English Opera and Opera in English can enlist the sympathies of a large portion of our music-loving public has already been proved by Mr. Rosa on two former occasions; his last season in the metropolis, at the Lyceum Theatre, when Cherubini's "Water-Carrier" and Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" were so eminently attractive, triumphantly refuting the old-world notion that Italian is the sole language for music, since both these works were comparative failures when given at our fashionable lyrical establishments. Otto Nicolai's Opera, "Die Lustigen Wieber von Windsor," skilfully adapted from the German libretto of Herr Mosenthal by Mr. Hersee, was excellently chosen for the opening night of the present season; for not only is the story thoroughly English, but the work is so admirably suited for Mr. Rosa's company that, although no one part came out with undue prominence, the general effect of the performance was in the highest degree satisfactory. Nicolai's music is always pleasing, written throughout with a fluency which carries the story pleasantly forward, and although never rising to the Shakespearian level, save in the moonlight scene with the fairy revels, sufficiently illustrative of the varied incidents of the text to ensure success with a not over-exacting audience. The composer has, we think, but little idea of humour; for, curiously enough, this phase of Falstaff's character is left untouched, the musical colouring suggesting only the obesity of the knight, with the accompanying overweening sense of his own importance. Whether Mr. Aynsley Cook in his make-up of the part felt this we cannot say, but his stuffing and general appearance were more suited to burlesque than Opera, a defect for which it required all his capital singing to compensate. Miss Julia Gaylord, both as a vocalist and an actress, created a marked effect as Mrs. Ford; Miss Josephine Yorke's Mrs. Page was equally deserving of commendation; and Miss Georgina Burns, who made her first appearance in the small part of Anne Page, displayed a bright and well-trained soprano voice, which may, with more experience, be turned to excellent account. Unfortunately Mr. F. C. Packard, who sang the little music assigned to Fenton in the first act, was too indisposed to reappear, and the character was most efficiently taken by Mr. J. W. Turner, a proof of the ease with which Mr. Rosa can meet an emergency which might have thrown the whole Opera into confusion under a less careful and experienced manager. Mr. C. Lyall was an excellent Master Slender, Mr. Ludwig was an admirable Mr. Ford, and Mr. Snazelle as Mr. Page, Mr. H. W. Dodd as Dr. Caius, Mr. Brooklyn as Bardolph, and Mr. Muller as Pistol, if not separately entitling themselves to special notice, materially aided the ensemble. The Overture was finely played, and encored with an enthusiasm which showed how thoroughly it has established itself as a favourite by its frequent performance at concerts. The dresses and scenery were worthy of the highest commendation, the exquisite moonlight effects, with the refined and varied grouping around Herne's Oak, in the last act, eliciting a storm of applause which could only be appeased by the appearance of Mrs. Aynsley Cook, under whose superintendence the scene has been arranged. The orchestra, led by Mr. Carrodus, is most efficient in every department; and Mr. Carl Rosa, on his entry as Conductor, received an ovation which must have convinced him how heartily his efforts in the cause to which he has devoted himself are appreciated.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

This Society has continued its active and successful labours during the past month, under the direction of Mr. Barnby, amid increasing signs of public appreciation. On the 7th a performance of "Israel in Egypt" took place, and attracted a very large audience, many of whom, probably, were desirous before all of enjoying Handel's magnificent Choruses as rendered by the choir which Mr. Barnby trains so well. These were assuredly not disappointed by the result, for seldom have the "Plagues" and the "Song of Moses" had a more impressive interpretation. Without saying that the concerted pieces were uniformly well given, which would be nonsense in view of their greatly varying difficulty, it may be asserted without fear that nowhere did the choir fail, in any serious measure, to do justice to the music. With sustained skill and not less constant energy the "1,000" revealed the whole of Handel's splendid effects, and won a hearty acknowledgment from the witnesses. As usual, the bass Duet, "The Lord is a man of war," was sung by all the male voices, and, as usual, had to be repeated. Its encore might well have been commanded, even by those who object to the departure from Handel's intention, if only in acknowledgment of the singular skill with which the tenors and basses did their work. The soloists were Miss Anna Williams, in place of Madame Sherrington, absent through illness, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, and Mr. Edward Lloyd. All these artists did their best, to the satisfaction of the audience; but the success of the occasion fell to Mr. Lloyd, whose brilliant and energetic delivery of "The enemy said" roused the audience to enthusiasm, and led to an encore. Mr. Barnby conducted with all the firmness required by so large a body of executants when engaged upon such music, and Dr. Stainer ably presided at the organ.

The performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah," on the 21st ult., was especially interesting on account of the part of the Prophet being undertaken, for the first time in this country, by Herr Henschel. The German baritone has in a short period so firmly secured the good opinion of English audiences by his excellent singing that his appearance in a work of importance was anxiously looked for; and although applause must not always be accepted as indicative of real merit, there can be little doubt that in this instance at least the warmest demonstrations of approval were thoroughly deserved. Throughout the Oratorio Herr Henschel truly realised the intention of the composer, his placid solos, "Lord God of Abraham" and "It is enough," as well as the impassioned piece of declamation, "Is not His word," being given with a reverence for the text which proved how thoroughly his power was under the control of an innate artistic intelligence. Mr. Vernon Rigby sang with his usual effect the tenor part, and Miss Mary Davies, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Osborne Williams, and Madame Antoinette Sterling were most efficient in the music allotted to them, the last-named vocalist receiving an encore for her rendering of "O rest in the Lord." The Choruses were sung with precision and perfect command of the gradations of tone, under the baton of Mr. Barnby, who conducted the Oratorio with much skill and judgment. Dr. Stainer presided at the organ with his usual success.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

This Society, almost as a matter of course, keeps the two Oratorios of Sir Michael Costa on its active list, and might be expected to do so from a feeling of sympathy alone. It owes much to the veteran Conductor who for so many years has been its musical chief, while no more graceful acknowledgment could be made than an occasional presentation of the works by which he desires posterity to remember him. The Society's duty in this regard corresponds with its interest. Concerning the actual merits of "Eli" and "Naaman" various opinions are entertained, but the patrons of Exeter Hall are agreed as to their being worth attention, and whenever one or the other is performed a large audience is sure to gather. This fact was illustrated, as respects the younger Oratorio, in the early part of the last month. Into the discussion concerning the comparative value of "Eli" and "Naaman" we do not purpose entering. Enough that each has its admirers, the probability being that the more showy style of the second Oratorio secures for it a majority of votes among amateurs generally. At any rate, Exeter Hall was filled on the occasion to which we refer, the audience finding an ample reward in a singularly good performance. Without saying that Sir Michael Costa takes more pains to perfect his own music than that of any other composer, we may confidently assume that he does not take less, while it is easy to believe that those under him devote all their energies in a special manner to secure a good result. Hence the perfection of the rendering "Naaman" received, and the brilliant success of an exceptional evening. We need not discuss a work about which the public mind has long been made up. Even if we were so disposed, we could not, on the one hand, persuade amateurs that "Naaman" is a chef-d'œuvre; or, on the other, that it does not exemplify the advantages of being able to write attractive melodies of a pure and gratefully vocal character, to use both orchestra and chorus with a complete knowledge of effect, and to illustrate, with broad and striking force, a dramatic situation. These are, undoubtedly, the merits of "Naaman," and they go a long way to secure popular success. The soloists, who did very much for the triumph of the evening, were Miss Robertson, Mrs. Osgood, Madame Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley. Miss Robertson is less adapted for Oratorio than for the lighter works of the secular concert-room. Nevertheless, she made a favourable impression and obtained a good deal of applause, as well as one encore, for the music of Adah, a part in which Madame Adelina Patti originally appeared. Mrs. Osgood, as the Wife of Naaman, sang with marked power and effect. The American soprano is rapidly making her way to the front, and, what is more, conquering the position by the combined force of talent and industry. We are glad of it, for there is a sad dearth, at present, of English-speaking soprani. Madame Patey, always efficient, was encored in her one Air; Mr. Vernon Rigby sang as Naaman (for the first time in London) with a success amply justifying the composer in choosing him for the part, and Mr. Santley left nothing to desire in the rôle of Elisha. The Choruses were effectively given, one and all; and at the close of the performance, as before it began, Sir Michael Costa was loudly applauded.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Although no novelty was given at the opening concert of this Society on the 14th ult., the programme was in the highest degree attractive; for not only were Mozart's ever-welcome Symphony in G minor and Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor included amongst the orchestral works, but Herr Joachim performed Beethoven's Violin Concerto with an effect which we scarcely remember to have heard equalled. Mrs. Osgood, who was the vocalist of the evening, sang Wagner's Scena, "Liebes-Tod" (from "Tristan und Isolde"), with great success, and also gave Spohr's "Rose softly blooming" with true artistic feeling. The orchestra has undergone some changes for the better; and Mr. W. G. Cusins, who conducted, seemed resolved to introduce a greater degree of refinement in the rendering of the works than we have hitherto been accustomed to at these concerts.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

The twenty-third season of the performances of this excellent choir commenced with what was termed a "preliminary" concert on the afternoon of the 14th ult., at St. James's Hall. The solo vocal music was given by Mdlle. Alwina Valleria, Mesdames Lablache and Parodi, Signori Runcio, Del Puente, Rocca, and Foli. The selections also included the clever violin-playing of M. Musin, who, in a Fantasia by Leonard, displayed a good tone and considerable executive power. The four subscription concerts (the first of which was announced for the 26th ult., too late for notice in our present number) will contain but few novelties, although most of the pieces rendered so popular through the medium of this choir will be given during the series. We may say, however, that the celebrated "Miserere" of Basily, formerly sung at St. Peter's, at Rome, during Holy Week, will be sung under the direction of Signor Rotoli, lately a member of the choir at St. Peter's; and at the fourth concert Bach's Motett for double choir, "Be not afraid," will be performed for the first time. Mr. Leslie also announces two morning concerts, at which the principal artists of Her Majesty's Opera will appear.

MADAME JENNY VIARD-LOUIS'S CONCERT.

The first of five concerts given by the above-named artist at St. James's Hall, on the afternoon of the 5th ult., was so excellent, more especially as respects the rendering of the orchestral works selected, as to warrant us in bestowing the most unqualified praise upon all concerned. Under the able direction of Mr. Weist Hill, a band efficient in every department gave so perfect an interpretation of Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony and Rossini's Overture to "Guillaume Tell" as to elicit after each movement the warmest marks of satisfaction, even from those whose critical judgment has a claim to respect. Indeed it may truly be said that the rendering of Mendelssohn's Symphony revealed beauties which were but indicated in many of the performances to which we have listened in the metropolis; for, although both the Scherzo and the Finale were taken quite up to the speed intended by the composer, every passage was played with the utmost accuracy, and every point, especially in the last movement, was clearly and sharply defined. Madame Viard-Louis, in fixing upon Sterndale Bennett's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor, did not choose well for the display of her powers. She has vigorous execution and command of passage-playing; but neither of these qualities will secure success for so refined and poetical a work as Bennett's Concerto. She was much more effective in grappling with the difficulties of the pianoforte part of Raff's uninteresting Quintett, in which she was assisted by Herr Kummer, Mr. Palmer, M. Holländer, and M. Lassere. Madame Antoinette Sterling was the vocalist, and M. H. Leipold acted as accompanist at the pianoforte. The judgment and enterprise displayed by Madame Viard-Louis in the organisation of this series of concerts will, we trust, be rewarded by large attendances at the remaining four performances; for, if we may accept the first as a fair specimen of those which are to follow in monthly succession, no real lover of the greatest orchestral compositions will miss hearing them presented under such exceptionally favourable circumstances.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

As the season advances the special attractions presented by these Concerts begin to multiply, and, as a consequence, the spacious St. James's Hall assumes on each successive evening a more crowded aspect. Whether the latter be chiefly owing to the reappearance of certain favourite artists, or to the increased variety of classical music displayed in the respective programmes, we do not presume to decide. Certain it is that even the more lengthy and abstruse portions of the chamber works performed invariably meet with the enthusiastic approval of the auditors. Nor do we question the sincerity of these somewhat stereotyped plaudits after every single movement; for where all is more or less excellent the homage thus rendered to the executive artists may safely be even indiscriminately bestowed. In resuming our chronological record of the evening performances, we have to notice the first appearance this season of two of the most eminent violinists of the day, MM. Joachim and Wieniawski, as well as the début of Herr Ignaz Brüll, the pianist-composer, who has but recently gained dramatic laurels by the performance in various parts of Germany of his Operas "Der Landfriede" and "Das goldene Kreuz." The reappearance of that accomplished baritone Herr Henschel must likewise be reckoned among the "events" of the season.

The last Monday in January introduced, as already announced in our previous number, the Viennese artist Herr Ignaz Brüll to the musical public as represented by the frequenters of these sterling concerts; and his performance of Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), and participation in Schumann's Quintett in E flat, for pianoforte and stringed instruments, met with a very favourable reception, the execution of the former resulting in an encore. Other instrumental solos were furnished by Madame Norman-Néruda, who played with much grace and refinement a Cavatina by Raff and a Tambourin by Leclair. Not the least interesting portion of the programme was the production of Schubert's String Quartett in B flat (Op. 168), a novelty to English audiences, but one which, by a few repetitions, will doubtless be raised to the rank of a favourite. Although an early manifestation of the composer's genius, and yielding to his later works of a similar kind in depth of conception and the almost unbounded flow of ideas, it bears the stamp of immortal youth on its every movement. The work was finely played by Madame Néruda and MM. Ries, Zerbini, and Pezze. Madame Antoinette Sterling, who in her rendering of Mr. Davison's effective song "False friend" and of two German Lieder was much applauded, had the benefit of Sir Julius Benedict's masterly accompaniment, that gentleman acting as Conductor.

In the first concert of last month (4th ult.) the programme was devoted entirely to works by Beethoven, including the Quartett in F major (Op. 59) for stringed instruments, and the Trio in D major (Op. 70) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, both works being rendered in such a manner as to disarm criticism. Herr Wieniawski, who was the leading violinist, played, or rather sang on his instrument, the Romance in F, with pianoforte accompaniment, it being the exquisite cantabile which especially distinguishes the style of this eminent artist. His performance having been vociferously encored, Herr Wieniawski had an opportunity of displaying his great executive skill in the Prelude to Bach's Violin Sonata in E, a performance which again elicited the most enthusiastic applause. Mdlle. Marie Krebs, who presided at the pianoforte, did full justice to the drastic contrasts of the Variations in C minor for pianoforte alone—a most striking instance of the composer's boundless fertility of imagination—being also associated with MM. Wieniawski and Piatti in the performance of the Trio already referred to. Mdlle. Sophie Löwe was the vocalist; M. Zerbini officiated as Conductor.

The second evening of the past month (11th ult.) was again distinguished by the co-operation of MM. Wieniawski and Brüll, who, in conjunction with Signor Piatti, opened the Concert by a capital performance of Beethoven's Trio in E flat (Op. 70), a work the mere mention of which will recall delightful emotions to every amateur. The instrumental solos were divided between MM. Brüll and Wieniawski, the former playing, with great power and precision, Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," and the latter giving a "Legend" of his own composition, both performances being encored. The Concert concluded with Beethoven's Septett in E flat (Op. 20), admirably rendered by MM. Wieniawski, Zerbini, Lazarus, Wendtland, Wotten, Reynolds, and Piatti. Herr Wieniawski, however, is essentially a solo performer whose exquisite refinement of style and general artistic culture appear to less advantage in the performance of chamber music, where, without undue self-assertion, a more robust individuality of tone than his is listened for, at any rate by ears accustomed to a Joachim or a Wilhelmj. Mr. Pyatt sang with effect vocal pieces by Handel and Schubert; his voice is a low baritone of a very agreeable timbre, and, though he does not as yet exercise an absolute control over his vocal powers, a little judicious training will doubtless supply the deficiency.

On the evening of the 18th ult. the long-looked-for appearance of Herr Joachim at his accustomed post of leading violinist at these concerts was the distinctive feature. The chamber music on this occasion consisted of Beethoven's Quartett in E minor (Op. 59) and Haydn's Quartett in D minor (Op. 76) for stringed instruments, the executants being MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, and Piatti; having stated which, it is superfluous to add that the performance of these two works was throughout admirable. Herr Brüll was again the pianist, and in his rendering of Schumann's Fantasia in C major (Op. 17) confirmed the favourable impression which his clear exposition and effective delineation of contrasts had created on previous occasions. His style is perhaps somewhat too rigid, and, in his interpretation of works like the above of Schumann's, we miss those subtle touches of poetic feeling by which players of inferior technical acquirements to those of which Herr Brüll disposes succeed in placing themselves at once en rapport with their audience. Herr Joachim played in his usual unapproachable manner the Siciliana and Finale from Bach's Sonata in G minor. The splended rendering on the part of Herr Henschel of Lieder by Schumann and Schubert elicited the most enthusiastic applause. The gifted singer will, we understand, permanently take up his residence in London. M. Zerbini was again the Conductor on the occasion in question. We must delay notice of the following concert (which took place on the 25th ult.) until our next issue.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

After a somewhat longer interval than usual, the Saturday Concerts at this establishment were resumed on the 9th ult. One very interesting novelty, and another no less interesting revival, formed the specialties of the concert on that afternoon. The former was Brahms's

"Rhapsodie" for alto solo and male-voice chorus (Op. 53), a work the first performance of which in England was given in May last by the Cambridge University Musical Society, under Mr. Villiers Stanford, but which, except on that occasion, had not previously been heard in this country. The words of this very remarkable composition are taken from Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter;" the lines, which describe a misanthrope wandering in solitude over the mountains, and which conclude with a prayer to the "all-loving Father" to comfort his heart, are such as would scarcely have been selected by any other composer for musical treatment. Brahms, however, is of so original a genius that the subject seems exactly suited to his peculiar style of thought; and he has produced in the "Rhapsodie" a work which, though scarcely containing within itself the elements of popularity, is of a refined beauty appealing strongly to the feelings of the cultivated musician. The piece commences in the key of C minor; the opening Recitative and the Air commencing "Who can comfort his anguish" are impressed with a profound melancholy; and the sudden change to C major, with the entry (for the first time) of the chorus pianissimo, in the final movement, is one of the most striking points in the work. The solo part was excellently sung by Fräulein Redeker, and the chorus was well given by the male voices of the Crystal Palace Choir, who, however, were too numerous for the proper effect of the music, the balance between the chorus and the soloist being in parts quite destroyed. The revival above referred to was that of Handel's second Oboe Concerto. The works known as "Oboe Concertos" are not Concertos in the modern acceptation of the word, that is pieces for the display of a soloist with accompaniments for the orchestra. This use of the word was not unknown in Handel's day—as witness his Organ Concertos—but the term was also employed to designate a composition in which many instruments played together, and was nearly equivalent in this sense to our "Symphony." The Oboe Concertos closely resemble in their form orchestral Suites. They received their title because they contain parts for oboes, and in some cases for other wind instruments also, and thus differ from the Grand Concertos, which are for strings only. The Concerto in B flat, revived at the Crystal Palace, has solo parts for two violins and two oboes, with accompaniment for strings. It is a pleasing and interesting work, though the form in which it is written has now become antiquated. It was capitally played under Mr. Manns's direction, the solo parts being well given by Messrs. Watson, Jung, Dubrucq, and Peisel. The remainder of the programme included the "Eroica" Symphony, of which a remarkably fine performance was given, the introduction to the third act of Wagner's "Meistersinger," a pleasing entr'acte from Massenet's "Don César de Bazan," and vocal music by Fräulein Redeker and Mr. Santley.

The Concert on the 16th commenced with a Concert-Overture in F (MS.) by Mr. Thomas Wingham, one of the most talented and promising of the younger school of English composers. Mr. Wingham's latest work is constructed on very pleasing subjects, skilfully treated and effectively scored; its reception was deservedly hearty, and the composer received the honour of a call at the conclusion of his work. The Symphony of the afternoon was Schumann's No. 4, in D minor, which was played as (in this country at least) it can only be played at the Crystal Palace. M. Wieniawski was the instrumental soloist at this concert. He selected the first movement of a Concerto by Viotti, and a Polonaise of his own. Both served to display his fine tone and perfect mastery of his instrument, but neither was very interesting as music. The vocal pieces were more than usually attractive. Madame Patey gave a very fine rendering of Beethoven's "In questa tomba," and also brought forward a charming song, "The Lay of the Imprisoned Huntsman," from Professor Macfarren's new Cantata "The Lady of the Lake;" while Mrs. Osgood sang with great taste Spohr's "Rose softly blooming," and also showed remarkable dramatic feeling in the solo part of Mendelssohn's "Loreley" Finale, with which the concert concluded. In this work the members of the Crystal Palace Choir were heard at their best; they are thoroughly familiar with Mendelssohn's style, and it therefore receives fuller justice at their hands than some of the more modern works which they are called upon to sing. To complete the record of this concert, it must be added that the choir also gave a spirited and effective rendering of the Chorus "The hunt's up," from Macfarren's "May Day."

Herr Ignaz Brüll made his first appearance at these concerts on the 23rd ult., in the double capacity of composer and pianist. His Concerto in C major (No. 2) is a work which bears testimony not only to great natural ability, but to the thoroughness of his studies. It is written strictly in the classical forms of Mozart and Beethoven, the only difference being that the cadenza, formerly indispensable at the end of the first movement, is not introduced. In its subjects the Concerto is pleasing without being strikingly original. Of its three movements the first Allegro is the least interesting; the Andante and Finale are charming. The workmanship, thematic treatment, and orchestration are excellent. The solo part, played, as above said, by the composer, is very effective and brilliant, without being so enormously difficult as is the case in some Concertos of recent production. Herr Brüll as a player is refined and artistic; there is no assumption about him; he does not astound by a display of musical fireworks, but he pleases by a thoroughly finished and musicianly style. He was, as he well deserved, warmly received. A second specialty at the same concert was Wagner's "Faust-Ouverture"—a work which may almost be regarded as a novelty, seeing that it had only once before (in October 1874) been heard at the Crystal Palace. The Overture is intended less as a prelude to Goethe's play than as a musical illustration of the character of Faust himself, or rather of one aspect of it. The motto prefixed to the score is taken from a conversation between Faust and Mephistophiles, in which the former expresses his longing for death and his loathing of existence. As may be anticipated, the music is of a most sombre character, full of power, but by no means of a kind to be generally popular. The Overture, though very finely played, appeared to be but little appreciated. A very excellent performance of Mozart's E flat Symphony and the Overture to Bennett's "May Queen" completed the orchestral selections. A young lady with a pleasing but not very powerful voice, Miss Merivale, made her first appearance as a vocalist at the Palace; the other singer of the afternoon was Herr Henschel, who gave with much effect an Air by Carissimi and Schumann's "Two Grenadiers."

MR. KUHE'S FESTIVAL.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

The programme of this Festival, which began, in the Dome of the Brighton Pavilion, on Tuesday the 19th ult., and is still continuing, does not differ in any special measure from its predecessors. Mr. Kuhe has a somewhat difficult part to play. The public to whom he chiefly appeals is a mixed one, with perhaps a preponderance towards light tastes, and it is needful therefore to make no small provision of popular music. On the other hand a classical minority demands to be served; and there is also a necessity to keep the programme, as a whole, up to Festival rank. But Mr. Kuhe is a man of experience, and he contrives, as far as possible, to satisfy all parties. Oratorios, Cantatas, and high-class orchestral works please the connoisseurs, while others find their favourite pabulum in a host of pieces generally known as "miscellaneous." It may be said that the second class of patrons are catered for with undue liberality, and perhaps the objection has some weight from a Festival point of view. But Mr. Kuhe knows better than anybody else what the Brightonians will stand, and it is very certain that no entrepreneur can afford loftily to ignore the doctrine of expediency. In other respects the arrangements are as satisfactory as heretofore. A small but efficient orchestra is led by Mr. Carrodus; Mr. Kuhe's Festival Choir, a new body that has taken the place of the local Sacred Harmonic Society in connection with these concerts, supplies a fairly good chorus; and the principal artists comprise most of those just now available in the higher ranks of vocal art.

The series of performances began well, on the day above named, with Mr. F. Clay's Cantata "Lalla Rookh" and Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen"—both of them examples of that national talent which it was, doubtless, Mr. Kuhe's desire to honour. "Lalla Rookh," as the reader will have in mind, was written for and produced at the Festival of last year. Its presentation a second time should be regarded therefore as a particular proof of favour, at which those who know the work need not entertain any surprise. Whatever Mr. Clay's music may lack, it is, as a rule, pleasing and acceptable to the popular ear. Its melodies, if not strikingly original, have charm, while the choral and orchestral pieces seldom fail to gratify by reason of their simple and engaging structure. Hence the success of "Lalla Rookh," in which the composer appears at his best. The Cantata was as well received on its second as on its first hearing, though the performance had not the advantage of Mr. Clay's personal direction. All concerned did their utmost, Mr. E. Lloyd once more carrying off honours by his excellent rendering of the important tenor solos; and it may be said without hesitation that "Lalla Rookh" has now established itself as a Brighton favourite. Bennett's charming Pastoral, concerning the merits of which nothing need be said, since it long ago took rank as an English classic, was heard throughout with delight. Its pure and beautiful music never wearies the ear, nor does sympathy ever fail to attend the progress of a work which breathes the very atmosphere of ideal English rural life in the "good old times." Mr. Kuhe conducted both Cantatas, and had no reason to complain that his efforts to please by means of native music were met with coldness.

On the following day a "classical" concert took place under the direction of Mr. August Manns, who had wisely been engaged to conduct a number of important orchestral works needing experience and skill like his for their adequate interpretation. The programme opened with Beethoven's "Leonora" Overture, a worthy exordium, and was continued by Chopin's E minor Concerto, with Mr. Kuhe as soloist. Mr. Kuhe plays Chopin's music quite as well, to say the least, as that of any other master, and his rendering of the "E minor" was a special success, the audience—essentially one of amateur pianists—being loud and unanimous in expressions of approval. Then came Mozart's Symphony in G minor, welcome as flowers in May; and after it the first of three works written specially for the Festival—Mr. Alfred Cellier's "Suite Symphonique" for orchestra. We are not going to quarrel with Mr. Cellier about a name, but cannot help saying that his composition had better have been styled a Suite merely, unqualified by "Symphonique." True there are in it the symphonic four movements, Allegro, Scherzo, Romance, and Finale; but the term cannot be used without involving the application of a symphonic standard, which the work is unable to bear. The movements are all pleasing, more or less, and have features not without still higher merit, but their lightness of structure places them outside the category to which, nominally, they belong. As a group of movements making no very lofty pretensions, we can, however, accept them heartily, and hope that the composer may be encouraged to produce other things from time to time with steady purpose to reach ultimately a higher level. Mr. Cellier conducted his own music, and was well received. Other features of interest in this concert were Spohr's Scena Cantate for violin, ably played by Mr. Carrodus, the March from Lachner's First Suite, the Overture to "Ruy Blas," and the singing by Miss Annie Sinclair of Mozart's "Parto," with Mr. Lazarus's clarinet obbligato. The whole passed off extremely well, thanks in great measure to Mr. Manns, that gentleman's perfect knowledge of everything done enabling him to secure the best possible results.

The third concert took place on the evening next ensuing, and was "miscellaneous," ranging from Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto to an orchestral selection from "L'Etoile du Nord." In the programme were the Overture to "Euryanthe," the ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors," a Minuet by Boccherini, the Overture to "La Gazza Ladra," and three vocal duets pleasingly sung by the Misses Allitsen. Over these more or less well-known things we pass to others, around which the interest of the occasion mainly gathered. And, first, as to the Pianoforte Concerto; not, however, as to the Concerto itself so much as to its performance by a young lady, Miss Kuhe, who chose the work for her début. Schumann's noble and beautiful contribution to the highest répertoire of the instrument he loved needs no analysis or recommendation here. Having passed through the fierce ordeal of criticism, and survived the buffets of prejudice, the Concerto is now a classic among us, not understood in full perhaps, but everywhere treated with the confidence of those who know it is safe to trust the composer where he cannot clearly be traced. Whether Miss Kuhe did well to choose music so difficult is a question open to serious doubt. It is one, however, we shall not discuss, because, though the work in its higher meaning was not adequately exhibited, it served to show that the young executant has qualities of a sterling sort. She plays with a facility and intelligence indicative of admirable results in the future, and her immediate doings are certain to be watched with interest, in the hope that they may show a steady advance. Miss Kuhe, who had a warm reception from a sympathetic audience, was the recipient of numerous bouquets at the close of her task, and retired amid applause really enthusiastic. The Concerto, we should add, was conducted by Mr. Walter Macfarren, who also directed the performance of a new Pastoral Overture, specially written by him for Mr. Kuhe's Concerts. We shall not, of course, be expected to commit ourselves to a positive opinion on the exact merits of this work after no more than one hearing. But no hesitation need prevent us from saying that it made a most favourable impression, due to melodious themes, clear development in strict form, and charming colour laid on with delicacy and skill. The leading melody is above all attractive, and is dwelt upon and expanded as though the composer knew its worth; while, throughout, the "pastoral" element, as that element is conventionally expressed in music, makes itself felt without being obtrusively present. We hope to hear the Overture soon with a larger orchestra, meanwhile we congratulate Mr. Macfarren upon a work which, while making no great pretensions, can hardly fail to win great favour. At the close of the performance Mr. Macfarren was recalled and loudly applauded.

The first week's doings ended on the 23rd with "Elijah," Mendelssohn's chef-d'œuvre attracting, as usual, a large audience, and being performed, on the whole, in an effective manner. The soloists were Madame Edith Wynne, the Misses Allitsen, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley.

An extremely successful Concert was given at St. James's Hall on the 15th ult. in aid of the Organ and Repairing Fund of Trinity Church, St. Marylebone. The vocalists were Mrs. Osgood, Madame Worrell-Duval, Madame Sintzenich, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Ashley Foster, and Mr. Maybrick. Mrs. Osgood in "Love, the Pilgrim" (Blumenthal), and Mr. Edward Lloyd in the "Blue Alsatian Mountains" (Adams), met with their usual success; Mr. Stedman was most favourably received in a new song, "Bright eyes" (Osborne Williams); and the Trio "I Naviganti," by Madame Duval, Mr. Stedman, and Mr. Maybrick, was also a feature in the programme. Miss Madelina Cronin was much applauded for her pianoforte solos. The boys of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, St. James's, assisted by the Lucinian Quartett Society and other gentlemen, added greatly to the interest of the concert by their excellent rendering of some Madrigals and Part-songs, Master Grounds eliciting an encore for the solo part in Bishop's Chorus, "Now tramp." Mr. T. H. Wright played two harp solos, and Mr. Osborne Williams conducted with his usual ability.

The St. George's Glee Union gave its usual Monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms on Friday the 1st ult., the part-music, "Fairy song" (Zimmermann), "Calm be thy slumbers" (Bishop), "In this hour of softened splendour" (Pinsuti), "Hunting Song" (Mendelssohn), and "Soon as I careless strayed" (Festa), being well sung by the choir, especially Pinsuti's Serenade, which was redemanded. The solo vocalists were Miss Florence Lavender (a pupil of Mr. Theodore Distin), Miss Ellen Booth, Mr. George Carter, and Mr. Theodore Distin, all of whom were highly effective. Miss Louisa R. Distin played two pianoforte pieces with much success. The music to "Macbeth" (attributed to Matthew Locke), concluded a very satisfactory programme, the solo parts being well sustained by Misses Spear and White, and Messrs. Small, Harvey, and Ellis, and the Choruses being rendered in a manner that must have been very gratifying to the Conductor, Mr. T. Garside, who was ably assisted throughout the evening by Mr. Joseph Monday, the latter gentleman also acting as accompanist.

Mr. Walter Bache, whose Annual Concert took place at St. James's Hall on the 19th ult., again gave prominence to the compositions of Liszt, the programme including the orchestral Poëme Symphonique "Orpheus," and the "Fantasie über Ungarische Volksmelodieen," for pianoforte and orchestra, the bénéficiaire playing with much brilliancy the pianoforte part in the last-named work. The Scene Dramatique, "Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher," of the same composer, was well declaimed by Miss Anna Williams; and his "Paysage" and "Ballade" received ample justice at the hands of Mr. Bache, who never seems so much at his ease as when interpreting the thoughts of his master. The audience contained a large number of sympathetic listeners; and the applause after each of these works was warm and enthusiastic. Some well-written Part-songs by Peter Cornelius were effectively sung by Miss Anna Williams and Mr. Maybrick; and Mr. Walter Bache proved his sympathy with the classical school by selecting Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat for the display of his powers. The concert was ably conducted by Mr. Manns.

The Committee of the Bristol Musical Festival Society has unanimously elected Mr. D. W. Rootham to succeed the late Mr. Alfred Stone as Chorus-master of the Festival Choir. Mr. Rootham is well known in the city as an able and intelligent musician, and his gentlemanly and considerate behaviour towards his brother artists and pupils has won him universal respect and esteem. Mr. Rootham has for some time been the Conductor of the Bristol Madrigal Society, and likewise holds the appointment of Organist of St. Peter's, Clifton. He is also one of the Lay Clerks of the Cathedral. On Thursday the 7th ult. Mr. Rootham was introduced to the choir by Mr. R. H. Wilson, one of the newly appointed Hon. Secretaries of the Festival Society, and was very cordially received. In thanking the members for their kind reception, Mr. Rootham paid a fitting tribute to the memory of their late Chorus-master, and expressed a hope that in time he might perhaps be able to deserve as much of their regard and esteem as they had most justly accorded to their late beloved friend Mr. Stone.

The Grove Park Choral Society, Chiswick, gave its second Concert this season on the 1st ult., at the New Vestry Hall, Turnham Green, which was well filled. The programme on this occasion had been divided into a sacred and a secular part, and the selection of the music was of so excellent a character as to reflect great credit upon the Society, which is, as yet, only in the second year of its existence. It will be sufficient to mention Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer," Spohr's "As pants the hart," Schubert's "The Lord is my Shepherd," the Fishermen's Chorus from "Masaniello" (Auber), the Bridal Chorus from "Lohengrin," the Spinning Chorus from the "Flying Dutchman," and the March from "Tannhäuser" (Wagner) as having formed part of the programme in order to show that something more than a mere amateur performance was intended; and the result was on the whole a decided success. Mr. Theodore Drew again proved himself a most efficient Conductor; Miss B. F. Wyatt being, as before, a very able accompanist.

The fourth Annual Entertainment by the Violin Class took place at the Birkbeck Institution on the 9th ult., under the direction of Mr. Fitzhenry. The vocalists were Miss Leonora Braham (who gave a finished rendering of Sullivan's "Orpheus with his lute" and Gounod's "O that we two were maying"), Miss Ida Coleman, Miss Orridge (who elicited loud applause for her singing of Eaton Faning's "Lyulph's Tower" and Hullah's "Storm"), and Mr. Thurley Beale (who sang Gounod's "Nazareth" and Diehl's "Moss-Trooper," gaining an enthusiastic encore for the latter). Mr. T. E. Gatehouse was well received in two violin solos (De Beriot's Fifth Air Varié, and a manuscript Sonata by S. arvis); pianoforte solos were given by Miss Lina Cam pbel and Mr. S. Jarvis, and two selections were excellently rendered by the Violin Class. The programme was agreeably diversified by the introduction of two readings, admirably delivered by Mr. C. Rendle. The Theatre was crowded in every part by a thoroughly appreciative audience.

In the Twenty-eighth Annual Report of the Choir Benevolent Fund we find the gratifying announcement that a fourth donation of ten guineas each will be given to the widows of all deceased members. Not only have we this tangible evidence of the financial prosperity of the Fund, but the committee draws attention to the fact that six new members have been enrolled, and several candidates are now applying for admission. It is also stated that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales has given his name as Patron. An institution so truly charitable in its object, and so valuable in an artistic point of view, as tending to perpetuate the works of the great composers of English Church music, deserves the warmest sympathy and support of all interested in choral worship; and we earnestly hope that the next Report of this excellent Society will afford us increased evidence of its influence and importance.

The Academy says, "Mr. Dannreuther has commenced a fifth series of performances of chamber music at his residence, 12, Orme Square. The first was given on the 14th ult., when Mr. Dannreuther was assisted by Messrs. Henry Holmes, Burnett, and Lasserre. Mozart's piano Quartett in G minor, and Schumann's in E flat, were the most important works brought forward. At the second concert, on the 28th ult., a piano Trio in E minor, by Mr. Hubert Parry, Saint-Saëns's Suite in D for piano and violoncello, Schumann's piano Sonata in G minor, and Beethoven's great Trio in E flat were promised. There are probably no concerts given in London at which so many novelties are to be heard as at these performances."

A lecture on the "Study of Bow Instruments" was given by Mr. Frederic Clark on the 5th ult. at Trinity College, London, before a crowded audience. Illustrations were played by a string quartett, in which Messrs. Buziau, Hann, and Pettit assisted the lecturer, the selections being made from Pleyel, Haydn, Mozart, Cherubini, and Beethoven, to exhibit the style of each writer, and the gradual improvement of the Quartett. Mr. Clark's paper was chiefly directed to show the advantages of playing bow instruments, and included an earnest appeal for the cultivation of the violin by women. During the evening there was a public presentation of persons admitted to the diplomas of the College.

The Grosvenor Choral Society gave its seventy-second Monthly Concert on Friday the 15th ult. The programme was miscellaneous, including a flute solo by Mr. G. Stanford; a pianoforte duet, the "Allegro vivace, minuetto, and finale" from Haydn's Thirteenth Symphony, well played by the Misses Hartley; and a concertina solo (encored) by Mr. T. F. Williams. The Part-songs were exceedingly well rendered, many of them being redemanded, as was the Quartett "When evening's twilight," sung by Messrs. Bateman, W. Powell, Henry Baker, and A. Baxter. The other vocalists were Miss Gertrude Hemming, Mrs. Davies, Miss Melloes, Miss Kate Reed, and Mr. T. Nettleship. Mr. J. G. Callcott conducted.

With respect to the notice of Aske's Schools, at Hatcham, in our last number, Professor Macfarren informs us that he either said, or intended to say, that Oxford stands at the head of the Universities now giving care to musical culture; and that his attention was not drawn to the omission until he read the report of his address in our journal. Whilst on the subject, we may mention (in reply to some inquiries) that the scholarships awarded at the examination are given by the school; and that the titles are merely attached to them as a mark of respect for the artists whose names they bear, the first being for one year, the second for half a year, and the third for a quarter.

On Wednesday the 13th ult. a performance of the "Messiah" was given by the Band and Chorus of the North London Choral Association, at the Bow and Bromley Institute. The soloists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Coyte Turner, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. G. Weige; trumpet, Mr. T. Harper; organ, Mr. V. Miles. The solos and choruses were splendidly given under the conductorship of Mr. Bassett. A word of praise is due to Mr. V. Miles, Organist of St. John's, Haverstock Hill, who accompanied in a masterly manner on the organ of the Institute, which possesses many intricacies not usually met with in organ construction.

An Evening Concert was given by James Colmer's Blind Choir on Tuesday the 5th ult. in the Spa Fields School-room, Clerkenwell, before a crowded audience. The programme consisted of high-class secular music, and the encores—which were too numerous—gave undoubted proof of the artistic manner in which the music was rendered. Messrs. Claydon and Freeman presided at the piano, which was kindly lent, free of expense, by Messrs. Strohmenger and Sons, of Goswell Road. Great credit is due to the Blind Poor Relief Society of Hunter Street, under whose management this efficient choir has been trained.

The Organ Recital at the Bow and Bromley Institute on the 9th ult. was given by Mr. Hallett Sheppard. His programme, which contained compositions by Bach, Handel, Spohr, Kullak, and the performer himself, was varied and interesting, and presented agreeable contrasts of style. Mr. Sheppard's playing was excellent, his rendering of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C major being especially worthy of praise. A choir connected with the Institute, and under the direction of Mr. W. G. M'Naught, sang some Glees very fairly.

The morning Concert of Miss Cecile S. Hartog, a promising pianist, was given at Willis's Rooms, on the 21st ult. The playing of the bénéficiaire, of Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant (violin), and Miss Frances Thomas (clarionet), elicited the warmest marks of approbation. Vocal solos were contributed by Misses Rosa Leo, Mary Davies, and Orridge, and Mr. Wadmore, all of which were well received. The accompanist was Signor Randegger.

The Balance-sheet of the recent Leeds Musical Festival shows a pecuniary result which must be in the highest degree satisfactory to those who have so zealously laboured in the cause. The sum of £800 has been distributed to the local charities, although no expense was spared in the engagement of principals, band, and chorus.

Bach's Passion (St. John) will be again sung with orchestral accompaniment under the direction of Mr. Barnby, at St. Anne's Church, Soho, on each Friday evening during Lent (commencing on the 8th inst.) at eight o'clock, except on Good Friday, when the service will be at four o'clock. Tickets for admission can be obtained of the Rev. Canon Wade, 28, Soho Square.

Mr. Patrick S. Gilmore will shortly arrive from the United States with his celebrated band for a tour in England. His business agent is Mr. Charles Blöe, of the firm of Messrs. C. Kelly and Co.

REVIEWS.

Carmen. Opéra comique en quatre actes. Tiré de la nouvelle de Prosper Merrimée. Poëme de H. Meilhac et L. Halévy. Musique de Georges Bizet. [Paris: Choudens père et fils.]

It would be a remarkable fact but for the dead-alive condition of lyric drama amongst us that, whereas French musicians continue to write Operas distinguished by more or less ability, their works not only remain unperformed in this country, but well-nigh unnoticed. Take the case of M. Bizet's "Carmen" as an example. Here is an Opera of unquestionable merit, by one of the most promising composers whom relentless fate ever snatched away from life and labour—an Opera that has been heard with applause in many cities outside France—and yet it is hardly rash to say that not a hundred amateurs in our islands have the slightest knowledge of it. Such a state of things should not be, nor, as far as lies in our power, shall it continue any longer. From time to time, as noticeable works appear on the lyric stage of our neighbours, their merits will be discussed in these columns—not as contributions to minute criticism, but rather with a view to such a general idea as may at once convey information and excite a desire to know more.

"Carmen" is not exactly a new Opera, since its composer has been dead some two and a half years. It was, however, M. Bizet's last work, and the one which, if not most in accord with a dominant sympathy for "grand" Opera, best expresses the nature of his genius and the fertility of his resources. M. Merrimée's novel must be familiar to readers of French fiction, who will at once see how readily its story and its scenes lend themselves to effective stage representation. The libretto of the twin dramatists wants for nothing in the way of mental and sensuous excitement. It is a panorama of striking pictures, illustrating a narrative that scarcely for a moment flags in interest. The first act opens in Seville, near a guard-house and a tobacco manufactory. Soldiers sing, the guard is relieved, to the sound of fife and drum, chorused by the gamins of the street, and all is bustle and life. Presently the cigar-makers, male and female, troop out of the factory, and among them Carmen, a gipsy, to whom the men pay great attention, she returning quip for quip. The girl seeing that Don José, Brigadier of the Guard, is heedless of her charms, throws him a bouquet and runs away. As Don José feels himself touched by the incident, a young woman, Micaela, arrives with a loving message from his mother, whom he determines to visit, though unable to shake off the gipsy's spell. At this point cries of alarm are heard. Carmen has stabbed one of her fellow-workwomen, the brigadier is called to arrest her, and ordered by his officer, Zuniga, to conduct her to prison. Meanwhile Carmen brings all her charms to bear on Don José, who finds himself loving her even against his will. The curtain falls as the girl is led off to durance vile. In the second act we are at a tavern where Carmen (having been allowed to escape by Don José) and two other gipsy girls are carousing with some officers. The women sing their wild Bohemian songs, till a famous bull-fighter, Escamillo, appears on the scene, escorted by a crowd of noisy admirers. He flirts with Carmen a while, and departs as he came. The gipsies wish to go on some roving expedition, but just then Don José appears, and Carmen exerts all her art to lure the soldier from his colours. He hesitates, and while he does so his officer, who is also attracted by the gipsy, enters, and commands him to retire. Don José refuses, an altercation ensues, the two soldiers draw, the gipsies rush in from all sides, Zuniga is beaten off, and the curtain falls as the brigadier joins the Bohemian band. The third act transports us to the mountain lair of the gipsies. Here the three girls amuse themselves by reading the cards to learn their future fate. Carmen learns by this means that she and Don José will die together. At this point Micaela once more appears searching for Don José, as also does the bull-fighter looking for Carmen. The rivals meet, quarrel, and Don José is about to kill his enemy when Carmen intervenes, to such purpose that Escamillo departs in peace. An interview then takes place between the deserter and Micaela, from whom Don José learns the death of his mother. Carmen, now in love with Escamillo, persuades him to depart; but, mad with jealousy, he will not do so without her. A stormy scene follows, and as the curtain falls Don José takes his leave, vowing that he and Carmen shall meet again. The last act occurs at the entrance of the bull-ring in Seville, and opens with all the bustle and excitement of a popular gathering. Escamillo, the hero of the day, appears with Carmen; and near them, on the watch, is Don José. The girl is cautioned against her old lover, but fears nothing, till presently, the mob having crowded into the circus after Escamillo, they are left together. A long and exciting dialogue follows, varied by the cries of the mob as the bull-fight progresses within. Carmen tries to enter the circus, but her furious lover detains her. "Will you come with me?" he threateningly demands. "No!" is the prompt reply, as from the invisible spectators of the bull-fight a shout of "Victory" arises. Then Don José stabs the girl to the heart, and Escamillo and the crowd enter to hear the murderer exclaim, "You can arrest me. I have killed my adored Carmen."

Such, in outline, is the story of M. Bizet's Opera; and now, as to the music, let it be said once for all that every scene bears the stamp of no ordinary composer. "Carmen" is the work of a conscientious and able writer, who did whatever he essayed to do with all his might, and brought to it exceptional resources. This fact appears in the structure of the important concerted pieces, a structure that, without being involved, shows much more of careful and masterly design than usual on the French stage. It appears also in frequently happy characterisation, of which the music given to Carmen is a prominent example. Nothing could better express the wild, wayward nature of the heroine than do the strains M. Bizet has put into her mouth. Here let it be pointed out with what force and completeness the composer reproduces all the features of Spanish and Bohemian music. In this respect the work is singularly interesting, and the Habanera "L'amour est un oiseau," the Séguedillo "Prés des remparts de Seville," and the Bohemian song "Les tringles des sistres tintaient" might be profitably studied, as showing how a musician, not "to the manner born," can, by care and thought, identify himself with national types of song. But nothing is more characteristic of M. Bizet, as he appears in this Opera, than his ability to enter with completeness into whatever he seeks to illustrate. The guard-mounting, with the chant of the street-boys, the gipsy revelry, the quarrel in the tavern, and especially the humours of a holiday populace in the last act, are all expressed in music which seems to fit exactly, and thus to satisfy mind as well as ear. M. Bizet, in short, was a dramatic composer, and the supreme qualification of a dramatic composer is to have the power thus shown. But it must not be supposed that the Opera is always on the strain, that its interest never passes from the bizarre or exciting to the pathetic. Against this the introduction of Micaela, and the atmosphere of home she brings with her, effectually guard. Micaela is another Alice, appealing to all the better and softer feelings amid surroundings which heighten their exhibition by force of contrast; and M. Bizet has availed himself of the character to display all the tender side of his artistic nature. Take, in proof, the touching Air "Je dis que rien ne m'épouvante," sung by Micaela in the third act, and the strains to which her message to Don José is put. Forcible in themselves, these portions of the work have the advantage of situations which call for perfect sympathy. Not possessing a full score, we can form no opinion of M. Bizet's orchestration, but there are ample signs in the pianoforte part that the accompaniments and entr'actes have no lack of interest. To sum up, "Carmen" is a work amateurs cannot look upon without a desire to make its better acquaintance; and we must regret that at present the chance of doing so is small. Our managers prefer to bring out third-rate Italian Operas, and act as though France could give us nothing higher and better than an Opéra-bouffe.

Biographie universelle des Musiciens, et Bibliographie Générale de la Musique. Par F. J. Fétis. Supplément et Complément; Publiés sous la direction de M. Arthur Pougin. Tome premier.
[Paris: Libraire de Firmin-Didot et Cie.]

THE "Biographie universelle des Musiciens" of M. Fétis, the first edition of which was published forty years ago, was altered and considerably enlarged by the author in a second edition. The advance of time, however, has rendered even this incomplete; and M. Pougin has therefore issued a supplement, the first volume of which, now before us—containing about half the work—extends to 480 pages. In looking through the amended edition of Fétis's "Biographie" we have often been struck with the singular inaccuracy of many of the details, more especially when we know that in most cases the truth could easily have been ascertained by communication with the artists themselves, if living, and with their relatives, if deceased. When the "Supplément" of M. Pougin was forwarded to us we first looked to see whether these errors in the original work were corrected; but, with the exception of one or two dates, we have failed to find a single alteration. For example, our countryman William Sterndale Bennett, in Fétis's work is said to have gone through a course of study at Cambridge University, after leaving "Cipriani de Potter" at the Royal Academy of Music; to have taken lessons of Moschèles; to have written music to a Ballet called "Les Nayades;" to have produced an Opera entitled "La Nymphe de la Forêt," in England—"dans lequel," it is said, "il y avait de bons morceaux"—and to have followed this by "Parisina." Now not only is the whole of this information untrue, but the facts are so well known to all the fellow-students of the composer that, even now, they could be elicited from many we could name with the utmost ease. The truth is that Bennett was not educated at Cambridge, that he took pianoforte lessons of no one but Cipriani Potter, and that he never produced, or even wrote, an Opera in his life. Curiously enough, M. Pougin, with that strange disregard of everything relating to English life and manners so characteristic of Frenchmen, accepts all that M. Fétis has written, adds a list of his later works, in which he makes no allusion to the "May Queen," and tells us that Bennett was created a Baronet by her Majesty with two other musicians, M. Julius Benedict and Doctor Elvey. Why the "May Queen" is omitted from Bennett's compositions is afterwards explained, for in speaking of Mr. Chorley (the late musical critic of the Athenæum) it is stated that he wrote the libretto of this Cantata, which was composed by "M. Julius Benedict." In the notice of the career of Mr. J. L. Hatton we are told that he wrote Operas entitled "Sardanapale," "Pizarre," "Henri VIII," "Richard II," and "Le Roi Lear;" but M. Pougin says that he does not know whether they have ever been performed. We can scarcely understand how, if M. Pougin is not aware of their having been performed, he could have become acquainted with the existence of such works; for the fact is that whilst Mr. Hatton was Musical Director at the Princess's Theatre (when under Charles Kean's management) he merely supplied the incidental music for these plays; which, so far from being in an operatic shape, were produced as nearly as possible according to the original text. Then, in speaking of Niels Gade, it is said that his Cantata, "The Crusaders," was composed for an English festival (meaning of course that at Birmingham); but the truth is that this was an old work, the composition written expressly for the festival being the sacred Cantata "Zion." In looking through the list of artists included in M. Pougin's "Supplément," we find no mention of J. F. Barnett, Joseph Barnby, or W. H. Cummings; and it cannot but appear singular to the admirers of our "drawing-room vocal music" that "Claribel" should be admitted and "Virginia Gabriel" excluded from the work. Of course it is possible that we might multiply examples of these sins of omission and commission; but we have said enough to prove the desirability of having both the original Biography and the Supplement carefully revised. We know the extreme difficulty of collecting authentic information for a work of this class; but any person undertaking so gigantic a task must not shrink from labour in the cause. In the first place, whenever living artists are mentioned, the incidents of their career should be derived from themselves; and that this has not been done is proved by the fact of all the artists we have enumerated being amongst us at the time their biography was written. Then, where it is found impossible to verify circumstances connected with those who have passed away, they should not be stated authoritatively; for we know how books of reference are copied from, and how impossible it is to establish the truth or falsehood of a statement which has passed current for years. M. Pougin is evidently so earnest in his endeavour to perfect the "Biographie" of his predecessor, that we shall be glad if our remarks have the effect of urging him to reconsider some of the points we have mentioned.

Symphonies. Composed by F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy.
Overtures. Composed by F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy.
Pianoforte arrangement (Duet).
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

NOTWITHSTANDING the "dead set" which it has been, and is, the fashion to make against Mendelssohn in certain highly developed quarters, the music of that great master and consummate artist keeps its hold on the English public, and every effort to popularise his works by bringing them within easy reach is certain to meet with hearty approval. We have pleasure, therefore, in asking the notice of our readers for a new edition of the Symphonies and Overtures arranged for four hands on one pianoforte—an edition de luxe while moderate in price, and so carefully edited that, although every page has passed under our eye, we have not detected a single error. Arrangements of great works such as these are primarily intended for home use by amateurs, who are enabled to reproduce in the domestic circle the forms, if not the colours, of the magnificent tableaux that delight them elsewhere. It is necessary therefore that the transcription, while sacrificing nothing essential, should be as far as possible within the reach of amateur executive talent. In this respect the arrangement before us is admirable. The outlines of each work are everywhere clear, but there is no crowding in of details calculated to embarrass the performer with difficulties the overcoming of which would involve more trouble than profit, and perhaps turn him from the task altogether. Hence, wherever home pianists rejoice in a fair degree of ability, these Symphonies and Overtures will be received as a precious addition to the store of domestic music and we can conceive nothing more interesting than the task of familiarising their minds with works of so much value and beauty as a preliminary to that full enjoyment which can only be derived from hearing them in the concert-room. In this lies the chief value of transcriptions à quatre mains, and we advise those who would listen to Mendelssohn's orchestral works with an intelligent knowledge, and who cannot study them in score, to attain that desirable end through the medium now presented.

The Triumph of Time and Truth. An Oratorio. Composed in the year 1757, by G. F. Handel. Edited, and the pianoforte accompaniment revised from that of the German Handel Society, by Ebenezer Prout, B.A.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Originally written to a little poem by Cardinal Pamphili on the Power of Time, when the young composer was at Rome, this work, as performed at the house of Ottoboni, another Cardinal, who had a private orchestra, conducted by Corelli, could scarcely have borne out the title of "Oratorio;" but in its present shape it claims to take rank amongst the most interesting of Handel's compositions, for some of the Choruses, especially, are in the master's best manner. In 1737 the work as first composed (with some few additions, and with the Italian text) was revived in London; but as it appears in the edition before us, with English words by Dr. Morell—a tolerably close translation of the original—it was the very last composition of Handel, when he was totally blind, and of course therefore must have been dictated to his amanuensis. Mr. Prout, in his "Editor's Preface," gives an interesting account of the pieces which were contained in the Italian Oratorio of 1708, and also those which were afterwards taken from the composer's other works. Dr. Morell's words go so exceedingly well to the music throughout that it is difficult to imagine that they are a translation, the Recitatives more particularly being remarkable for sympathy between the notes and the text. Considering that this Oratorio was previously inaccessible in a cheap and convenient form, the present carefully edited octavo edition will be cordially welcomed by the many Handel lovers who do not limit their admiration to a few of his best-known works.

Octavo Edition of Trios, &c., for Female Voices. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Amateurs will be delighted to find that so extensive a collection of what may be termed "home music" as that before us is now included in the well-known "octavo edition" which has helped so many comparatively unknown works into popularity. Trios for female voices are always welcome in a drawing-room; and when we say that forty-two of these are already issued, and that the series is to be continued, it will be seen that there is a tolerably extensive répertoire to choose from. Amongst these may be mentioned eleven by Henry Smart, one being the beautiful Chorus, "Hail to thee, child of the earth," from the "Bride of Dunkerron;" eight by Dr. Hiller; four by Hatton; Choruses by Schubert, the Psalm, "The Lord is my shepherd," being included amongst the number; arrangements of the Chorus, "With a laugh as we go round," from Sir Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen;" of the Duet, "I waited for the Lord," from the "Hymn of Praise," the Trio, "Say, where is He born," from "Christus," and the Trio and Chorus, "Hearts feel that love thee," from "Athalie" (Mendelssohn); besides compositions of Mozart, Spohr, Sir H. Bishop, Gounod, Brahms, Wagner, and many others, some of which are by no means so well known as they deserve to be. All these works have a pianoforte accompaniment, that to Brahms's Psalm, "Lord, how long shall I be out of Thy remembrance," being arranged for the organ, or two performers on the pianoforte.

L'Etoile du Nord. An Opera, in Three Acts. Composed by Giacomo Meyerbeer. Edited, and the pianoforte accompaniment revised, by Berthold Tours. The English version by Henry F. Chorley. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Originally written for the opening of the new Opera-house at Berlin in 1844, under the title "Ein Feldlager in Schlesien," and produced three years afterwards as "Vielka," at Vienna, this work has now fairly taken its place amongst the composer's Operas as "L'Etoile du Nord," the name given to it when it was represented in Paris, with important additions and alterations. At the Royal Italian Opera, in London, it has become an established favourite, not only from the merit of the music, but from the opportunity it affords of introducing those spectacular effects to which modern operatic audiences are accustomed. The dramatic power evidenced by Meyerbeer in the well-known Operas which preceded this has ample scope in the varied incidents of "L'Etoile du Nord," and its exceptional length is rarely felt, therefore, as an objection. As in all the lyrical works of the series issued by Messrs. Novello, the music has been carefully revised, and the indications of the score given when necessary. The English version of the Opera having been left unfinished by the late Mr. Chorley, it has been skilfully completed for this edition by the Rev. J. Troutbeck.

FOREIGN NOTES.

The inauguration, which took place on the 2nd ult., of the new Royal Court Theatre at Dresden, an institution associated with the practical activity of C. M. von Weber and Marschner, Richard Wagner and Julius Rietz, is an event of more than purely local interest. The new building, which is erected on the site of the old house, destroyed by fire some eight years ago, is pronounced a very fine one, possessing above all most perfect acoustic properties. The architect is Herr Semper. The proceedings of the opening night consisted of a spoken prologue written for the occasion, followed by a stirring performance of Weber's "Jubel" Overture; after which Goethe's drama "Iphigenia" received an adequate representation, which concluded the festive arrangements. For the following day Beethoven's "Fidelio" was selected as the first operatic performance in the new house, wherein, it is hoped, the high artistic principles will continue to prevail which the composer of "Der Freischütz" and "Euryanthe" so earnestly strove to inculcate during the best years of his career. There are but few other events in connection with German operatic establishments to be recorded this month. Herr Richard Wuerst's new Opera, "Die Offiziere der Kaiserin," which was performed for the first time at Berlin at the end of January last, achieved but a qualified success. On the other hand, Herr Ignaz Brüll's operatic work, "Das goldene Kreuz," continues in its progress of popularity, having recently been represented at Hanover and other leading German towns. At the Hoftheater of Schwerin, the production of Herr Wagner's "Walküre" has filled the house to overflowing during the last few weeks. The same composer's "Siegfried" (like "Walküre" a part of the famous Tetralogy) is to be produced on the Munich stage during the present month; and the dramatic prologue to the same giant work, "Das Rheingold," as well as "Walküre," is to be performed at Leipzig in April next, to be followed in the coming autumn by the remaining two works to complete the Tetralogy, viz. "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung." Thus it will be seen that German operatic managers are thoroughly in earnest in their endeavours to prove that the elaborate latest music-drama of their famous countryman may be adequately represented, even apart from the special conditions created for the purpose at the Bayreuth Theatre. Madame Christine Nilsson was expected in Hamburg last month, to appear in a cyclus of operatic performances; Madame Gerster-Gardini is announced to give a series of representations at the Royal Opera at Berlin, commencing on the 21st inst. At the latter institution an important measure of discipline has, according to the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung, lately been introduced, the directors having prohibited the practice of throwing bouquets, &c., upon the stage during a performance. "Gardeners will lament at the change," the above-quoted journal adds in effect, "prime donne will be furious; but the interests of art will gain by it in the end." Another far more sweeping reform in a similar direction is, however, said to be contemplated, the report of which comes to us from Cologne. The director of the Stadt-Theater of the Rhenish town just mentioned is, it is stated, about to convene a congress of German operatic managers, which is to meet at Leipzig, for the purpose of considering the steps to be taken with a view to checking the exorbitant monetary pretensions of modern operatic singers. There can be no doubt that the question is one which commends itself with daily increasing force to the serious consideration of impresarios, but—as Le Ménestrel, in alluding to the circumstance, justly remarks—nothing short of an international congress could possibly lead to practical results. Meanwhile we may thank German operatic directors, should their intended congress become a reality, for publicly drawing attention to the pernicious "star" system of our days, which, while tending eventually to prove fatal to all unendowed operatic institutions, is at the same time inconsistent with the true interests of the art itself.

Pablo de Sarasate, the Spanish violin virtuoso, has during the past month continued his triumphal tour in Germany. The eminent violoncellist Adolphe Fischer has given most successful concerts both at Leipzig and Berlin, in conjunction, at the latter place, with Madame Annette Essipoff, the Russian pianist, of whose remarkable gifts the Berlin journals speak in terms of the highest eulogium.

The principal works to be performed at the forthcoming Music Festival at Kiel will be Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

An interesting reprint has recently been issued by the firm of Trautwein of Berlin, under the auspices of the Gesellschaft für Musikforschung, namely, that of the oldest Wittemberg four-part hymn-book, compiled in the year 1524 by Johann Walther, by direction of Martin Luther. It is only some twenty-five years ago that fragments of the book (about the actual existence of which doubts had long been entertained) were discovered in the public libraries of Munich and Dresden, the two supplementing one another, and forming a complete copy of the work. While on the subject of musical bibliography, we may mention that a very rare and curious book bearing upon the art is also shortly to be republished by M. E. Thoinan of Paris, entitled "L'Entretien des Musiciens," the author being Annibal Gantez, and the year of its publication 1643. Apart from its extreme scarcity, the work is chiefly interesting as treating of the musical customs and peculiarities of the period from which it emanates. Only four copies of the original edition are known to exist, one of which is in the possession of M. Thoinan, who thus generously resigns his favoured position for the benefit of the many.

The Berlin Wagner-Verein celebrated its first anniversary last month by a banquet, to which some 500 members and their friends sat down, and which was followed by some highly interesting musical and musico-dramatic performances. A herald, clad in the style of the middle ages, having formally announced the commencement of the performance, a small orchestra composed of eight musicians, under the direction of Herr Wilhelm Tappert, played the oldest-known Overture, that to "Orfeo," by Monteverde; after which the audience were treated to a representation of the most venerable lyric-drama, "Robin et Marion," by Adam de la Hale, which was first played at the Court of the King of Naples in 1282. Some German songs of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, a Serenade for violin by Jacob Walther, and a Sonata by Kuhnau, written in 1696, concluded the historic programme.

Gluck's "Armida" was performed last month at the Imperial Opera at Vienna. The grand work of the "father of modern Opera" was, according to the opinion of the press, most worthily represented, Madame Materna's interpretation of the character of the heroine being especially praised.

Herr Heinrich Hoffmann, the successful composer of "Armin," is engaged upon a new Operatic work, which will be entitled "Aennchen von Tharau," for the Hamburg stage.

At a Concert recently given at Hanover, in which Herr Hans von Bülow took part, the programme included a Quartett for pianoforte and stringed instruments (Op. 11), the production of a young English composer, Mr. A. C. Mackenzie. Herr von Bülow played the pianoforte part.

A "Wagner Catalogue" will shortly be published by the firm of André at Offenbach, being a chronological list, with biographical notes, of the whole of "the master's" works, both artistic and literary, as well as of all books, pamphlets, &c., which have ever been issued regarding them. The author, Herr Kastner, has been engaged in the compilation of this elaborate work for the last five years.

M. E. Pessard's Operetta "Le Char," which was performed for the first time at the Paris Opéra-Comique a few weeks ago, seems to have hit the popular taste, and is likely to have a long run. The libretto deals in a trifling spirit with a subject taken from classical antiquity, somewhat after the manner of M. Offenbach's works, the character of Aristotle especially being rather disrespectfully treated. M. Pessard has been a pupil of the Conservatoire. Another novelty in comic Opera is M. Lecocq's "Le Petit Duc," which was produced at the Théâtre de la Renaissance on the 25th of January last, when its complete success was assured. Since then the new work of the composer of "La Fille de Madame Angot" has become the talk of all Paris, and the Renaissance is nightly filled to overflowing. The directors of that institution have, it is said, entered into a further contract with M. Lecocq for two three-act comic Operas, the libretti to be from the pen of MM. Meilhac and Halévy, who are also the joint authors of the libretto to "Le Petit Duc." At the Théâtre-Italien Mdlle. Albani and M. Capoul are just now the chief attraction; a young Hungarian tenor, M. Gassi, who recently made his first appearance at that establishment in "Il Trovatore," met with but a cool reception. At the Grand-Opéra the splendid representations of Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine" continue. The same composer's "L'Etoile du Nord" is in course of preparation at the Opéra-Comique. M. de Flotow's new Opera "La Rosellana" will, it is now stated, not be brought out by the Théâtre-Italien before next winter, the work not being entirely completed. The composer, who has arrived in the French capital, has, however, brought with him another new work, entitled "L'Enchanteresse," originally intended for another lyric stage, which is now in course of preparation at the Italien, and in which Mdlle. Albani will sing a principal part.

A new concert undertaking has been started at the Théâtre Saint-Martin by M. Cressonnois, for the production of minor vocal and instrumental pieces, a feature being made of works dating from the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries. The concerts have so far been very well attended.

Possessors of Stradivarius violins will be interested to read that at an auction recently held at Paris a superb instrument by the great Cremonese obtained the high price of 22,000 francs.

At the Popular Concerts at Bruxelles selections from Wagner's Operas were given last month, including fragments from "Tristan," "Meistersinger," "Siegfried," and "Walküre." At Rotterdam, too, a great Wagner concert is to be given, in which 200 singers and seventy-five instrumentalists will take part. The poet-composer's "Liebesmahl der Apostel," his "Faust Overture," and "Siegfried Idyl" are among the works to be performed.

Madame Adelina Patti and Signor Nicolini are still singing at the San Carlo Theatre at Naples, the former receiving 7,000 francs, and the latter 3,000 francs for each performance, besides which the lady is entitled to one-half of the proceeds in excess of 20,000 francs. Thus, for instance, on January 29 last, when the receipts amounted to 30,000 francs, she was paid 12,000 francs for the one performance. (See also our opening paragraph on the modern "star system" and operatic managers.)

A young English baritone, Mr. Richard Coker, a pupil of Signori Alary, of Paris, and Ronconi, of Milan, has made a most successful début at Lucca, in "La Favorita." The Italian papers speak in the highest terms of his great qualifications for the lyric stage, predicting for him a very brilliant career. Mr. Coker sings under the nom de guerre of Riccardo della Rosa.

Maestro Pinsuti's new Opera, "Il Mercante di Venezia" ("The Merchant of Venice"), was recently performed for the first time at the Teatro Pagliano, in Florence, with great success. We have received a number of Italian journals recording the event, and bestowing much praise upon the merits of the work. The Opera, which was originally brought out at Bologna in 1873, is conceived in what is known as the grand-opéra style introduced by Meyerbeer.

Weber's "Der Freischütz" is just now on the répertoire of the Apollo Theatre at Rome. There was some opposition on the part of the italianissimi on the first night of its performance, which however soon disappeared, and on the second occasion the success of the German work was established. The principal parts are in the hands of the sisters Mariani, the tenor Barbacini, and the bass Castelmary.

Madame Marie Roze has in a short time become a favourite with the music-loving public at Philadelphia, where she is just now performing as a member of the opera company headed by the impresario M. Strakosch.

We frequently have occasion to notice in American journals the "progressionist" character of concert performances in various parts of the United States, and are agreeably surprised sometimes at the activity displayed by local musical societies and art institutions. Thus we read in a number of The Sunday Call, published at Newark (New Jersey), of a variety of concerts of high-class music having recently been held in that town; one of them, given by the "Thomas Orchestra," including such works as the Overture to "Rienzi" (Wagner), Andante from Symphony in C minor (Brahms), ballet music from "Queen of Sheba" (Goldmark), Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn), and "Danse Macabre" (Saint-Saëns).

We subjoin the programmes of concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Populaire (February 3): Symphony, L'Océan (Rubinstein); Septett (Beethoven); Concertstück for Violin (Sivori); Overture to "Sigurd" (E. Reyer). Concert du Conservatoire (February 10): Symphony in A minor (Mendelssohn); La Prière du Matin et du Soir, unaccompanied chorus (E. del Cavaliere); second and third part of "Roméo et Juliette (Berlioz); Chorus from "Armida" (Lulli); Overture, "Leonora" (Beethoven). Concert Populaire (February 10): Symphony, D major (Beethoven); Fragment from "Iphigénie en Tauride" (Piccini); Minuet (Boccherini); Overture to "Der Freischütz" (Weber). Concert Populaire (February 17): Reformation Symphony (Mendelssohn); Andante (Haydn); Fragments from "Struensee" (Meyerbeer); Concerto in C minor for pianoforte (Beethoven); Prelude (Bach-Gounod). Concert du Châtelet (January 27): "Christophe Colomb," Ode symphonique (Félicien David).

Leipzig.—Gewandhaus Concert (January 17): Overture to "Tasso" (Schulz-Schwerin); Concerto for violoncello (H. Witte); Songs and Air from "Euryanthe" (Weber); Symphony in A (Beethoven). Gewandhaus Concert (January 31): Overture, "Im Hochlande" (Gade); Violin Concerto (Bruch); Symphony in B minor (Schubert). Euterpe Concert (February 5): Overture, Scherzo, and Finale (Schumann); Rhapsody (Brahms); Pianoforte pieces (Schumann, Chopin, and David). Gewandhaus Concert (February 7): Requiem (Cherubini); Forty-second Psalm (Mendelssohn). Gewandhaus Concert (February 14): Overture to "Melusine" (Mendelssohn); Concerto for pianoforte (Scharwenka); Symphony in G major (Haydn).

Berlin.—Bilse Concert (February 6): Overture to "Manfred" (Schumann); March (Lachner); Concerto for violoncello (Vieuxtemps); "Phaëton" (Saint-Saëns); Walkürenritt (Wagner); Symphony in C major (Schubert). Concert of the Symphoniecapelle (February 6): Symphony in C minor (Haydn); Symphony in C minor (Brahms); Fragments from "Loreley" (Bruch); Hungarian Dance (Brahms). Stern'sche Singakademie (February 15): Handel's "Alexander's Feast."

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Mr. Cummings may like to know that the three copies of the French-Genevan Psalter mentioned by Dr. Rimbault are in the Euing Library at Glasgow. Mr. Brown speaks of them in his letter to which I referred in your last number. One of them seems to be well worth examination. Mr. Brown says that in it "the stave, sol-fa, and figure notations were all used together, with a long explanatory preface." The date of this psalter is 1559. If the edition of 1553 contains the Old Hundredth Psalm-tune, it will make the tune a year older than it was hitherto known to be, but this is by no means unlikely, because the first addition, consisting of thirty-four psalms, made by Beza to the Genevan Psalter, was published without tunes in 1551. The 134th psalm was one of those then added.

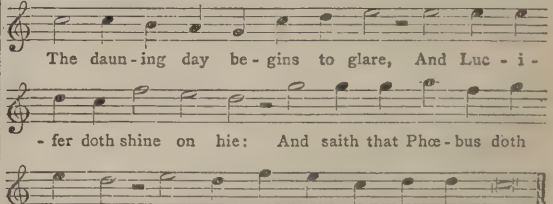
The earliest copy of the Genevan Psalter in the British Museum, so far as I am aware, is one without a date, but which can be referred on internal evidence to 1559 or 1560. All the other editions in the Museum are subsequent to the completion of the psalter in 1562, and are therefore valueless as regards the history of its growth.

This undated edition, like most others of the time, has the initials of the translator at the head of each psalm, but a curious illustration of the care necessary to be used in collating these books is furnished by the fact that in this edition two of Beza's versions are erroneously ascribed to Marot, while, by way of compensation I suppose, two of Marot's versions are left without any initials whatever.—Yours faithfully. G. A. C.

THE OLD HUNDREDTH PSALM.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Your learned correspondent G. A. C. remarks "that the first strain of the Old Hundredth tune is a commonplace of the period, and is found in several tunes of perfectly distinct origins." In confirmation of this observation, I submit a copy from "The Courte of Vertue, contayning many holy or spiretuall Songes, Sonnettes, Psalms, Balletts and shorte Sentences, as well of holy Scripture as others. By John Hall. Lond. by Tho. Marshe, 1565," 16mo. This carries identity not only in the first phrase, but to the end of the second line. It is entitled, "A Ditie to be sung of musiciens in the mornyng, at theyr lord or master's chamber doore, or els where of hym to be heard." The time of the notes is here halved, in order to facilitate comparison.



The daun-ing day be-gins to glare, And Luc-i-
-fer doth shine on hie: And saith that Phœ-bus doth pre-pare To shew him selfe im-me-diate-ly.

And the most darke tenebrous nyght
Is fayne to flee and turne her backe,
Whyche can in no wyse byde the lyght
But beares away hir mantle blacke.

Wherfore in tyme let vs aryse,
And slouthfulness doo cleane away:
Doyng some godly exercyse,
As seruantes true whyle it is day.

There are eight more stanzas, and after them "A Ditie to be sung at Nyght when men go to bed," which is to be sung "to the tune of In Sommer time when flowres gan spryng," which tune is included in the volume (p. 72). This John Hall is said to have been a surgeon, who practised at Maidstone, in Kent. He has a copy of verses prefixed to Gale's "Enchiridion of Surgery," 1563; and, in addition to works on his profession, he published in 1550 "Certayne Chapters taken out of the Proverbes of Solomon, with other Chapters of the holy Scripture, and certayne Psalmes of David, translated into English metre." I have not looked into that book to see whether the tunes are there as in the later work. Warton mentions also an edition in quarto of a book dedicated to King Edward VI. with this title, "The Psalmes of David translated into English metre by T. Sternhold, Sir T. Wyat, & William Hunnis, with certaine chapters of the Proverbes and select Psalmes by John Hall." This being in quarto is likely to contain tunes.

The "Courte of Vertue" was intended as an antidote to the "Courte of Venus," which we may suppose to have contained more lively airs. One more observation may be made upon Hall's scarce book—that it includes a translation of Psalm cxiii., "Non nobis, Domine." The first verse runs thus:—

Not unto us, Lord, not to us,
But to thy holy name alwayse,
For thy mercy & truthe, done thus,
Ascribed be all laude and prayse.

Since the tune is not printed to this psalm, we may assume that it was intended for the plain-song, a copy of which I once showed at a Conversazione of the Musical Society of London. It is of some interest, as the subject from which Wm. Byrde's Canon was derived.

Wm. Chappell.

[The resemblance to the "Old Hundredth" of the "Ditie" in Hall's "Courte of Vertue" was noticed by the Rev. W. H. Havergal in his "History of the Old Hundredth Psalm," published in 1854. A copy of Hall's work is to be found in the Douce Collection, Bodleian Library. Havergal adds a remark that "the use of the first strain is so common that it would be troublesome to enumerate all the known instances."—Ed. Musical Times.]

THE CELTIC ELEMENT IN ENGLISH MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In Mr. Green's interesting paper on the Telephone in your current number he says that "in England the basis of the musical temperament is Celtic." It would be very desirable if he would give his reasons for this statement, as the influence of the Celts on the English race and character is a matter of sharp controversy amongst historians and philologists. If there can be any argument founded on musical temperament, it ought not to be left out of consideration.—Yours faithfully,

W. J. Löwenberg.

Bamford, Rochdale, February 21, 1878.

[The controversy to which Mr. Löwenberg refers is of immense interest. Simply as an outsider in that controversy I venture to agree with Huxley in his opinion that the Celtic element in this country has been underrated. The statement Mr. Löwenberg is good enough to note was made only on the support of common facts of observation. What I implied was this, that neither the average Englishman nor the average German is of an artistic temperament; whereas in Germany the Slav and in Britain the Celt unquestionably is of a more nervous, more delicate, a more impassioned, a more musical and artistic organisation. That individuals of purely Teutonic or purely Anglo-Saxon origin should attain the highest eminence in art is a well-known exception in these discussions which no scientific man takes into account. On the other hand, it would not do to press the mere fact that so many composers of the English school have been Celtic in name or origin, or the equally obvious fact that so many quasi German artists are Hungarians or from the southern and eastern districts of Germany. The difficulty in questions of that kind becomes exceedingly prominent from the musical point of view. In matters of race and language we can follow to some extent the process of filtering and permeation of peculiarities from one adjacent country or district to another. But music leaps. Its spirit is so strongly diffusive, or suffusive, that not with the aid of the admirable efforts of Mr. Chappell can I, for one, satisfy myself as to the origin of the melodies he claims as Scotch or English or Irish. Following his guidance as much as possible, one is at times bound to form an independent opinion based on the internal evidence of the songs themselves. These questions have so far been generally treated from an historical or antiquarian point of view. The purely analytical and scientific method has yet to come, as far as music is concerned. It will take the lifetime of any one that attempts it. To show the difficulty of the antiquarian method I will refer Mr. Löwenberg, who seems to take an interest in the question, to one curious instance. There is no popular song more beautiful in its way, and none that either from association or from internal evidence in the music we are more disposed to call "thoroughly English," than "Black-eyed Susan." It is commonly attributed to Leveridge. In vol. iv. of the "Harmonicon" can be found a song called the "Bonny Sailor" by Maurice Greene. The first section of that song is almost note for note the same as "Black-eyed Susan;" and the principal motivo of both songs can be seen in a Terzetto by Buononcini, the personal friend of Greene. The mode of the song is a fine specimen of the Dorian! Is it Greek, or Italian, or English? The spirit of the song, the peculiar wail, is undeniably Celtic. We are accustomed to appreciate the musical organisation of certain provinces in England according to their proficiency in choral singing. Offering an individual opinion, I would say distinctly, I refuse that test. Choral singing is firstly a question of physique, in which the Danish and Anglo-Saxon foundation may truly be counted. Secondly, it is a question of tempo, as apart from rhythm and accent, and is purely a matter of perception; and proficiency in choral singing is also a question of discipline and steadiness, moral qualities in which the Anglo-Saxon excels. It is not in that direction, however, we must look for the inspiration which is to push us abreast of our continental rivals in art. We must regenerate the spirit of our national melodies, which may, some of them, be Anglo-Italian, and others Anglo-Celtic, but not one of them is Anglo-German; and the essence, I still think, of all of them is Celtic. With an intense love of the music of Bishop, Arne, and Purcell, I believe, after all, the only English music we possess are our "sea songs." And even in Dibdin there is a dash of Erse.—Joseph Green.]

GLASGOW CHORAL UNION CONCERTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I observe in the February number of your valuable paper a short article referring to the recent Glasgow Choral Union Concerts, which as it stands is somewhat calculated to mislead those who are not acquainted with the facts of the case. The paragraph in question (speaking of the final concert) says, "A list of all the works performed during the season was laid before the audience of the last concert but one, and a selection invited from each person, the understanding being that those pieces should be reperformed which met with the greatest favour."

Now it is not my purpose to discuss the merits or demerits of this experiment, but I think it is only fair to state that this concert had nothing whatever to do with the series of Tuesday Classical Concerts, except that the executants were the same; but that it was the last of the series of Popular Saturday Concerts, and that the list of music on which the "plebiscite" was taken consisted exclusively of the works performed at these Popular Concerts.

I think you will allow that this explanation, which was evidently unknown to the writer of the article, considerably alters the case, and that the selection speaks rather well than otherwise for the advanced state of popular audiences in Glasgow.

I inclose my card, and am, sir, yours, &c.,

A Subscriber to the Classical Concerts.

[We cheerfully give a place to the courteous letter of our correspondent. He is wrong, however, in supposing that we did not know the répertoire chosen from was that of the "Popular" and not of the "Classical" concerts. We were fully aware of the fact; but not, let us confess, of the exact character of the rejected pieces, a list of which now lies before us. From it we find that, while musical jokes, Overtures on National Airs, Fantasias, and dance music were chosen, the following works were rejected: the Overture to

"Oberon" (63 votes), Haydn's Symphony in B flat (61), Selection from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" (47), Selection from "Prometheus" music (46), Scherzo from "Scotch" Symphony (30), Bennett's Overture "The Wood-Nymph" (16), and Cherubini's Overture "Ali Baba" (13). Here, surely, is reason for dissatisfaction with the popular musical taste of Glasgow—dissatisfaction which true lovers of the art in that great city must share, or they are not what we take them to be. Whether Glasgow is behind other big towns in this respect is a separate question. We wish we could believe that it is.—Ed. Musical Times.]

THE VIOLIN AS A LADY'S INSTRUMENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Some of your numerous readers will perhaps give myself and others the benefit of their experience as to the effect of violin practice on the figure of slight and growing girls; and, supposing it to have a tendency to throw one (the right) shoulder down, whether there is any recognised exercise of a counteracting tendency. The violin cannot be thoroughly acquired unless the practice begins at an early age, and therefore the preventive remedy of waiting until the figure is well set must not be thought of, if there is any other antidote.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, Paterfamilias.

We have received another letter from the editor of the "Parochial Psalter," in which he quotes a passage from the Times to prove that there is a difference between stress and emphasis. If, however, he will refer to our last number he will find that we showed from his letter that he had confused stress and duration.—Ed. Musical Times.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

Martin T. Skeffington.—As the poet McNally, and the composer Hook, were both fond of Thames excursions, we have little doubt that the "Lass of Richmond Hill" lived on the hill in Surrey overlooking the Thames.

J. W. Ballen.—The facts forwarded by our correspondent respecting Mr. Curwen's paper read at the Musical Association are extremely interesting; but the demands upon our space prevent the possibility of our giving insertion to so lengthy a communication.

John Winterbottom,—We do not believe that there will be an examination for the National Training School until a new scholarship is founded, or one already existing becomes vacant. Students desirous of entering the Royal Academy of Music should apply to any of the appointed local Examiners.

Charles Churchill.—"Rule Britannia" was composed by Dr. Arne; see page 686 of Chappell's "Popular Music of the Olden Time."

H.—We cannot inform you from what Anthem of Blow's the passage quoted is taken. Jekyll's Anthem, "Behold how good and joyful," has not been printed.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Altrincham.—Mr. Welbye-Wallace gave a concert in the Literary Institution on the 4th ult., assisted by Mdlle. Redeker, Miss Emily Thornton, Signor Brocolini, and Mr. Ignace Gibson. The programme, which was miscellaneous, was well chosen, and excellently rendered.

Barnet.—On Monday the 18th ult. Mr. Broadhouse, Organist of Christ Church, gave a lecture in the British Schoolroom on the "Violin," illustrating his remarks by selections from Corelli, Tartini, Viotti, Rode, Spohr, Paganini, &c. Miss S. A. Broadhouse presided at the piano. At the close of the lecture a cordial vote of thanks was given to Mr. Broadhouse, and the applause of the audience at the conclusion was strong evidence of their appreciation of the lecturer's efforts to instruct and interest them.

Belfast.—The second Concert of the Cecilia Society was given on Tuesday evening, January 29, in the Ulster Hall. The first item in the programme was Ferdinand Hiller's Cantata Lorelei, for solo and chorus. The part of Lorelei, or Lurline, was admirably sustained by Mdlle. Thekla Friedländer. The tenor song of the "Fisher Boy," sung by a member of the Society, was well rendered and much admired. The Choruses were very effective, the singing of some old madrigals showing careful training by the Conductor, Mr. H. Stiehl. The first part of the concert concluded with the first portion of Beethoven's Third Concerto, the solo parts being given with brilliancy of execution by Mr. Stiehl. The accompaniments were played by Miss Henrietta M'Gahey in a manner which reflected the highest credit upon the young lady as well as upon her teacher. In the second part of the programme L'Hommage à Handel, by Moscheles, for two pianofortes, was the most effective instrumental performance of the evening, Miss C. Ritchie displaying a thorough command of the instrument. The concert concluded with Wagner's March and Chorus, from Tannhäuser, which was highly appreciated by the audience.

Birmingham.—The last of the present series of Chamber Concerts under the direction of Mr. Henry Hayward was given on Saturday evening, January 26. In addition to the usual String Quartett, the artists included Miss Hargreave (pianoforte), Mr. James Mathews (flute), and Mr. Bywater (vocalist). The programme contained Mozart's Clarionet Quintett and Trio—the flute being substituted for that instrument); a movement from Molique's Flute Concerto, Op. 43; solos for pianoforte and violin, and songs. The performance was good, and the concert well attended.——Messrs. Harrison's Third Subscription Concert took place in the Town Hall on Thursday evening, January 31. The artists included Mr. Mapleson's company, Mdlle. Marie Krebs (pianoforte), M. Musin (violin), and Mr. F. H. Cowen, (Conductor). The programme was not of special interest, but Mdlle. Valleria, Madame Lablache, and Signori Del Puente, Foli, Runcio, and others had opportunities of displaying their varied styles. Mdlle. Parodi made a very successful first appearance here. Mdlle. Krebs played in her best manner and was encored. The violin solos of M. Musin created an astonishing effect. The hall was crowded and the audience much pleased with the entertainment.——Mr. Frank H. Bradley, Organist of St. James's, Edgbaston, gave a performance of pianoforte music at the Masonic Hall on Tuesday evening, the 19th ult. The programme was exceedingly interesting, comprising among other novelties the Sonata in E minor (Op. 7) of Edward Grieg, and the March and Rondo by the late Dr. S. S. Wesley. Miss Emma Beasley was the vocalist, and gave with taste songs by Bennett, Rubinstein, and Schumann. Mr. T. M. Abbott played, with Mr. Bradley, Beethoven's Violin Sonata, Op. 12, No. 3, and some violin solos. Mr. R. M. Winn officiated as accompanist.——Mr. Stockley gave the first of his Orchestral Concerts for this season at the Town Hall on Thursday evening, the 21st ult. There was an efficient band of about fifty performers, with Miss Robertson and Signor Fabrini as vocalists, Mr. James Mathews solo flute, and Mr. John Cheshire harpist. The novelty of the evening was the manuscript Concerto by Mozart for flute, harp, and orchestra, which was well played and much admired. Mozart's Symphony in E flat, revived after a long neglect here, was the most important orchestral item, the others being the Overtures to Euryanthe and Zanetta, and a Gavotte by a young musician, a native of Birmingham, Mr. H. W. Wareing. All were well rendered. Miss Robertson gave a brilliant performance of the "Persiani" Variations on an Air by Paisiello, and was enthusiastically encored. She also sang Randegger's "Marinella," and Bishop's "Lo! here the gentle lark," to which Mr. Mathews contributed the flute obbligato. Signor Fabrini, who kindly proffered his services, gave an admirable rendering of "Cujus Animam" from Rossini's Stabat Mater, and was recalled. Mr. Cheshire played a brilliant operatic Fantasia, in addition to his part in the Concerto. Mr. Stockley conducted with masterly skill.

Bishop Auckland.—The Members of the Musical Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah on the 11th ult., with full band accompaniment. The solo vocalists were Madame Arabella Smythe, Miss Collings, Signor Fabrini, and Mr. Henry Pope. The principal instrumentalists were Madame Brousil and Mr. Vincent (violin), Mr. Robinson (trumpet), Mr. A. Brousil (violoncello), Mr. John Henry Brotherton (leader of the band), and Mr. T. Moses (harmonium). The concert, which was most successful, was conducted by Mr. W. Kilburn, jun., who was presented on the last night of rehearsal with a beautiful silver-mounted ivory baton, as a small acknowledgment of his valuable services, rendered gratuitously, as Conductor of this Society since its commencement. The presentation was made by Mr. Thomas Pickering, one of the honorary secretaries.

Brighton.—Mr. George Watts's Benefit Concert was one of the most successful musical entertainments ever given in the Dome. The presence of Midhat Pasha no doubt increased the attraction of the concert; but it was somewhat detrimental to its artistic features. The vocalists were Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Robertson, Miss Fanny Robertson (her sister), who was received with marked favour, Mdlle. Neunam, Miss Ellen de Fonblanque, Messrs. Guy, Walter Bolton, and Wadmore; Madame Norman-Néruda being solo violinist, and Mr. Charles Hallé pianist. All these artists were received with the utmost enthusiasm by a large and appreciative audience, the effect of the vocal music being materially enhanced by the skilful accompaniment of Signor Randegger. Mr. F. Kingsbury conducted the choir, and Mr. C. Robey presided at the organ. A collection made during the Concert for the Turkish Compassionate Fund realised £25.

Bristol.—Mr. A. Simmons, Organist and Choirmaster at St. Mary's-on-the-Quay, gave his annual concert at St. Joseph's Hall, Trenchard Street, on the 12th ult. There was an orchestra and chorus, the performers altogether numbering about a hundred. The first part, which consisted of sacred music, opened with Haydn's Chorus, "Distracted with care and anguish," which was sung with precision and expression. The Duet, "The Lord is a man of war," from Israel in Egypt, was well given by Mr. Stuart Higgs and Mr. Dyer; and was followed by a good rendering of the Kyrie and Gloria from Haydn's Imperial Mass. Madame Brettelle, Miss Kate Hayes, and Mr. E. T. Morgan were the other vocalists. Mr. Simmons conducted, and Mr. Skelding was an efficient organist.——On Monday the 4th ult. another of the series of Popular Concerts was given in the Colston Hall, with the usual band of about fifty performers, led by Mr. A. N. Naite, and conducted by Mr. George Riseley. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony, and the Overtures to Ruy Blas and Son and Stranger, the latter for the first time in Bristol. The Symphony was finely played. Miss Alice Fripp was the vocalist.—— On the 18th ult. another of the same series of Concerts was given, when Beethoven's Symphony, No 1, in C major, was most satisfactorily rendered by the orchestra. This was the first occasion at which a Symphony of Beethoven's had been attempted. Lachner's "Fest-Overture" was also given for the first time. Miss Ada Jackson was the vocalist, and Mr. George Riseley conducted. That these concerts are improving in the estimation of the public is evidenced by the increase in the attendance since their establishment.

Bromsgrove.—A Concert in aid of the funds of the Bromsgrove Institute was given in the Corn Exchange on Thursday evening, the 21st ult., for which the Committee secured the services of Miss F. St. Clair Taylor (of Birmingham), Messrs. Millward, Dyson, Smith, and Tyers, and Masters Blackford and Hill (of the Worcester Cathedral choir). The programme was highly interesting, and well rendered. Several solos were given, and the Glees, &c. by the Worcester Glee Party were sung with much precision and expression. Mr. J. B. Tirbutt presided at the pianoforte, and played the accompaniments throughout the evening, with his usual judgment.

Chesterfield.— The members of the Choral Society gave an excellent performance of Handel's Acis and Galatea, and Van Bree's Cantata St. Cecilia's Day, on the 5th ult., in the Market Hall. The soloists were Miss Henrietta Tomlinson, Mr. T. Coopen, Mr. E. Slack, Mr. R. Smith, and Mr. Grayson, of Lichfield Cathedral. Mr. H. Parkin led the band; Mr. Mountney presided at the harmonium; and Mr. H. N. Biggin conducted. The execution of the works was highly efficient, and they were well received by the audience.

Clifton.—On Friday the 1st ult. the third of Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy's Classical Chamber Concerts was given at the Victoria Rooms. The performers were Herr Straus (1st violin), Mr. J. A. Brooke (2nd violin), Mr. J. B. Zerbini (viola), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violoncello), and Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy (pianoforte). The programme opened with Spohr's Quartett, Op. 4, No. 1, admirably interpreted. Mendelssohn's Quartett, Op. 3, for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello followed; and the second part consisted of a violin solo by Mr. Pomeroy (Boccherini's Sixth Sonata), and Haydn's Quartett, No. 1.——On Tuesday the 3rd ult. Miss Farler gave her annual Concert at the Victoria Rooms, assisted by Mdlle. Alwina Valleria, Mdlle. Parodi, Madame Demeric Lablache, Signor Runcio, Signor Del Puente, Signor Monari Rocca, and Signor Foli. All the items in the programme were most enjoyable. Mr. F. H. Cowen conducted.

Cork.—The second Concert of the Orchestral Union for the present season took place at the Assembly Rooms on the 9th ult., when the hall was crowded. The orchestra of the Society, numbering nearly fifty executants, played the Overture to Fidelio (Beethoven), Schubert's Symphony in B minor, the Overture to Les Deux Journées (Cherubini), and Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor for pianoforte and orchestra, in which the solo part was excellently played by Miss Annie Atkins. Mr. N. P. Healy performed De Beriot's Tenth Air Varié, for violin solo; and, in conjunction with Messrs. Howard, Pickering, and Jack, Mozart's String Quartett in D minor. The vocalists were Mrs. H. G. Craig, Miss Agnes Power, Messrs. Harvery, McKiernan, and Murphy. Mr. W. Ringrose Atkins was the Conductor. The concert was altogether a success, and reflected much credit upon all concerned.

Dundee.—The first annual Artillery Concert was held in the Kinnaird Hall on the 14th ult. The programme was an exceedingly varied one, and the performances met with hearty applause. The vocalists were Miss Jenny Pratt, contralto; Mr. J. R. Miller, tenor; and Mr. G. R. Adams, baritone; and the instrumentalists Mr. Arthur C. Haden, violin; Mr. F. Richmond, organ and piano; the Campanologists, under the direction of Mr. W. Hill; and the band of the 4th F.A.V; Mr. C. J. Millar, Conductor. Miss Pratt was very successful, and had to respond to frequent encores. Mr. Miller and Mr. G. R. Adams also sang remarkably well. Instrumental solos were given by Mr. Arthur C. Haden on the violin, and Mr. F. Richmond on the organ and piano. The performances of the bell-ringers were very clever, and showed that the pieces had been carefully practised. Under the leadership of Mr. Millar, the band of the 4th F.A.V. played several selections in the course of the evening, and the entertainment was much appreciated.

Dunster.—On Thursday evening, the 7th ult., a Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms at the Luttrell Arms Hotel, it being the third of a series which has been held in the neighbourhood in aid of the Church of England Schoolmasters' and Schoolmistresses' Benevolent Institution. The concert was under the conductorship of Mr. T. J. Dudeney, the Organist of the church, who also played the whole of the pianoforte accompaniments in a masterly manner. The programme consisted of a good selection of vocal and instrumental music, besides several Glees and Part-songs, sung with remarkable expression, showing the most careful practice.

Eastbourne.—A Concert was given at the Pavilion, on Thursday the 7th ult., in aid of the Building Fund of All Saints' Church. The vocalists included Miss Marion Severn, Fräulein Kuge, Mrs. C. N. Hayman, and Messrs. Heisch, Ford, and Pedley. Miss Deane and Mr. George Langley contributed pianoforte solos. The principal feature of the evening was Schubert's String Quartett in G minor (Posthumous), played by Herr Cramer, the Messrs. Cooper, and Mr. Coles. Herr Cramer also performed Beethoven's Romance in G. The concert was in every respect a complete success.

East Twickenham.—The Choral Society gave its second Concert of the season on Tuesday evening, the 12th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. J. C. Dunster, when an excellent performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater was given The soloists were Miss Bradshaw (a promising soprano), Miss Helene Arnim, Mr. Stedman, and Signor Adelmann. The choir sang extremely well. In the second part several popular numbers met with great favour, among which was Rosellen's Duet on "Otello," brilliantly performed by Mr. Dunster and Mr. J. C. Dunster; the latter also contributed considerably to the success of the concert as accompanist.

Edinburgh.—The Edinburgh Orchestral Festival, which is now the chief event of the musical season in Scotland, commenced on the 9th ult. Thirty-seven years have passed since the munificence of General Reid secured the annual Concert that bears his name, and twelve years since the first efforts under the present régime in the way of reformation. Sir Herbert Oakeley may reasonably be gratified with the substantial improvements he has introduced. This year Mr. Charles Hallé, with his fine orchestra of seventy performers, was again engaged; Mdlle. Thekla Friedländer, whose simple unaffected style contributed as much as the rare purity of her voice to her hearty reception at the last festival, was the soprano, and Madame Norman-Néruda, whose fame in Scotland is now greater than ever, the violinist. A morning Concert began the festival. The second Concert was not less successful than that of the Saturday afternoon. Every seat in the building was occupied, the hall, adorned with choice flowers and plants, presented a festive appearance; and Herr Henschel, the German baritone, made his first appearance. The "Reid" and principal Concert of the Festival was on the 13th. This commemoration Concert has commanded much attention for many years in Edinburgh; but it is entirely owing to the untiring zeal and energy of the present Professor of Music in the University that an indifferent concert has grown to be the nucleus of a regular festival. Herr Henschel, who fully confirmed the favourable impression formed of his powers the previous evening, gave "Happy Hours," by Sir Herbert Oakeley. The Song is scored for orchestra, and the accompaniment is effective. The Song itself, which is in Schumann's style, is full of passion, and Herr Henschel did it justice in every way. The artist also gave a Serenade from Handel's Agrippina. He seems to excel in every class of music, and from the bravura passages in Handel's Almira to the pathos of Schubert's Der Neugierige everything was equally admirable. Mr. Hallé's orchestra was never more efficient. The selections included Symphonies: Mozart's "Jupiter" and Beethoven's "Eroica," and a new work, "A Rustic Wedding," by Goldmark, not yet heard in London. The Overtures were Il Seraglio, Euryanthe, Coriolanus, Melusina, Le Médecin malgré lui, Le Part du Diable, and Tannhäuser. Also Scherzo from the "Reformation" Symphony, Prelude to Meistersinger, Pianoforte Concertos by Beethoven, Mozart, and Chopin, and for violin by Spohr, &c. Madame Néruda's and Mr. Hallé's solos were received with the utmost enthusiasm.

Evershot.—The Annual Concert under the patronage of the Right Hon. the Earl and Countess of Ilchester was given in the new schoolroom on Thursday the 7th ult. The Glees, Part-songs, &c. were given by the church choir, and Solos were contributed by the Countess of Ilchester, whose singing was much admired, Mrs. Wilkins, the Misses Cave, and other amateurs. Mr. J. Manley, the Organist, sang "Nancy Lee," and for an encore Loder's "Diver."

Hastings.—A very successful Concert was given at the Music Hall, on Wednesday evening, January 30, by the members of St. Clement's Choral Society, assisted by eminent artists from London, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Hallett, Organist of St. Clement's Church. The first part consisted of Handel's Ode Alexander's Feast, with orchestral accompaniments, the band and chorus comprising about sixty performers. The principal vocalists were Miss Emily Thornton, Mr. Charles Beckett, and Mr. C. E. Tinney. Miss Thornton was highly successful in the several Solos allotted to her. Mr. Beckett sang with a fair amount of success, and Mr. Tinney was heard with admirable effect in "Revenge, Timotheus cries," and other Solos. The Choruses were, for the most part, well sustained, and reflected credit on the members of the Society. The second part was miscellaneous.——Dr. Abram's Benefit Concerts, which took place in the Skating Rink, Cambridge Gardens, on Wednesday the 6th ult., were most successful. The members of the Choral Union, under the able lead of the Organist of St. Paul's, seemed to eclipse all previous efforts, and carried out with marked ability and success programmes of an exceedingly varied and difficult character. The morning concert commenced with a performance of Mendelssohn's Athalie. The solo parts were taken by Miss Emily Moore, Madame Poole, and Mr. E. F. Moore. The recitation, by Mr. Henry Bonus, of the lyrics was a feature in the performance. Schubert's Twenty-third Psalm was next performed, and the programme closed with Mendelssohn's hymn Hear my prayer. The opening Solo was charmingly interpreted by Miss Moore, and the Chorus, "The enemy shouteth," was grandly given by the choir. It was, however, in the concluding Solo and Chorus, "O for the wings of a dove," that the great success was achieved by Miss Moore, whose refined and tasteful singing elicited rapturous and prolonged applause. At the evening concert Haydn's Oratorio The Creation was performed, the leading parts being sustained by Miss Emily Moore, Mr. Stedman, and Mr. Thurley Beale. The Choruses were especially well rendered. Mr. Zerbini led the band, and Dr. Abram conducted.

Huntingdon.—The Hunts Choral Society gave two performances of Handel's Judas Maccabæus in the Corn Exchange on the 30th and 31st January, under the patronage of the Earl and Countess Sandwich. The success of the instrumentalists (amateurs) was mainly attributable to the professional services of Mr. Villin. The following solos were well rendered: Recitative and Air, "From mighty Kings," Miss Rooper; Recitative and Air, "So shall the lute and harp," Mrs. Ewen; Air, "Father of Heaven," Miss Hopkins; and Recitative and Air, "The Lord worketh wonders," Mr. Boxall. The Choruses went well, especially "Lead on!" Mr. Rees, the talented Conductor, must be congratulated on the great improvement his pupils are making.

Kilmarnock.—On Friday evening, January 25, the Burns Anniversary was celebrated by a popular demonstration in the Corn Exchange Hall under the auspices of the Burns Statue Committee, the proceeds being applied to the fund for the erection of a monument in Kilmarnock to the poet's memory. The musical talent of the town having been secured for the occasion, an excellent programme of Burns's songs was prepared, which had the effect of attracting a very large audience. Provost Sturrock occupied the chair. On the centre of the platform was ranged a choir of picked voices under the leadership of Mr. Joseph Wilson, Conductor of Psalmody in the Low Church. Mr. Newsome, Organist of Trinity Church, presided at the organ; and Mr. Joseph Wilson, jun., Organist of the Low Church, presided at the pianoforte. The solo singers were Messrs. May, White, Dick, Shields, Williamson, Johnston, and M'Bride.

Leeds.—At the Town Hall Popular Concert on the 16th ult. the celebrated Brousil family was engaged, with Mdlle. Bertha Brousil as leader. The first piece given by these artists consisted of two movements from Mendelssohn's Quartett in D major, which was excellently rendered. Still more successful was Haydn's arrangement of the Austrian National Hymn, which was played with a precision and delicacy that could scarcely have been surpassed. M. J. A. Brousil gave a violoncello solo with much taste and ability, in which he was effectively accompanied by Mdlle. Cicely Brousil; and Mdlle. Bertha Brousil performed a Romanza (G major) by Beethoven. The first of Dr. Spark's contributions was the Chorus, "Blest is the man," from Handel's Oratorio, Joseph; and he also performed with much effect three celebrated Funeral Marches. Dr. Spark deserves the thanks and the assistance of every lover of the art for the efforts which he is making to popularise really high-class music.

Liverpool.—Not the least attractive of the Musical Societies of the town is the recently formed private choir of Mr. Frederick Barnes (Organist of St. Margaret's Church), the open rehearsal of which was rendered additionally interesting by the fact that Brahms's Song of Destiny was produced for the first time in Liverpool. This work is entirely written for chorus, and proceeds to the end without a break. Its performance was the most successful of the evening, both as regards accuracy and feeling, the long slow piano movement with which the composition begins being given with particular delicacy of expression. Throughout, the choir seemed fully at home amid the difficult and novel effects peculiar to this composer. Much praise is due to the lady who presided at the pianoforte, and to Mr. Barnes himself, who conducted both Brahms's work and Mendelssohn's setting of Psalm cxv. with skill and judgment.

Manchester.—The Misses Clelland gave a Concert in the Memorial Hall on January 28, when the second part of the programme was devoted exclusively to works by Manchester composers. Miss Carina Clelland was highly successful in "Casta Diva" and Dr. Hiles's song, "The Hebrew Mother;" Miss Edith Clelland was heard to advantage in Mr. Hecht's Duet, "Life," as also in Mr. Bradley's melodious ballad, "They tell me flowers are blooming still." Other solos were sung by Messrs. Jones, Whittaker, and White. Dr. Allison played three pianoforte solos, including his Tarantella in A minor.

North Elmham.—On the 19th ult. a very successful musical entertainment, with readings, was given in the National Schoolroom. The audience, though not so numerous as usual at these entertainments, was a very appreciative one, and heartily applauded every item of the programme. All the performers were Elmham people, the singers being the members of the church choir, and the readers the Rev. A. G. Legge, the vicar, and the Rev. W. Watson, of the County School. The programme was of a popular character, and included several Christy Minstrel Songs and Choruses, which were performed with great neatness and precision; but the gem of the evening was Mr. Pearson's Part-song, "Woods in winter," sung by the choir with much taste and feeling. Mrs. Legge played a solo on the pianoforte, and Mr. Pearson one on the violin.

Ockley.—On Monday evening, the 4th ult., Mr. Charles G. Sadler, Organist of the Parish Church, gave his second Annual Concert in the Schoolroom, assisted by Mrs. Calvert, Mrs. Kennedy, Miss Hibbert, Miss Chasemore, Mr. Kennedy, Lieut.-Colonel Calvert, and the choir of St. Margaret's. The programme consisted of Glees, pianoforte solos and duets, and vocal solos. The choir sang Stevens's "From Oberon," and Sullivan's "O hush thee," remarkably well. Mr. Sadler conducted.

Ryde, Isle of Wight.—The Choral Union gave Mendelssohn's St. Paul, on January 24, at the Town Hall. Soloists, Miss Jessie Brown, Miss A. Roper, Messrs. Hanson and Cross. The Choruses were well sung, the class fully sustaining the reputation long since obtained for correctness and vigour in attack. Special praise must be given for the rendering of "Help, Lord," "O great is the depth," "The nations," and "Is this he." Mr. Frank Amor led the orchestra, and Miss Margaret F. Fowles conducted.

Scarborough.—On the 6th ult. another of a series of Winter Concerts in aid of the funds for erecting an organ in St. Martin's Grammar School was given in the school. The programme was divided into two parts, the first consisting of Sir Sterndale Bennett's May Queen. To Messrs. G. G. Cleather, E. H. Holder, Miss Adelaide Banks, and Mrs. G. G. Cleather all praise is due for the admirable manner in which they rendered the solos. Miss Hutchinson and Mr. W. Creser, Mus. Bac., Oxon., presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. R. H. Turner at the harmonium. The Overture and pageant music were given in admirable style; and the accompaniment of the Cantata on the pianoforte by Mr. Creser was also a feature of the performance. Mr. Menzies, in the second part of the programme, was much admired as an accomplished violoncellist.

Sheffield.—A ballad and instrumental Concert was given in the Albert Hall on the 1st ult. Madame Rose Hersee, Madame Enriquez, Mr. B. M'Guckin, and Mr. E. Tovey were the vocalists, Mr. Keppel the solo flautist, and Mr. Bending the solo pianist and accompanist. The excellent manner in which the programme was gone through was highly pleasing to the audience, and the artists received frequent encores. The concert was a great success.——On the 9th ult. Messrs. Peck and Wainwright introduced the eleventh series of their weekly Concerts at the Albert Hall, the entertainment on this, as also on the following Saturday, being principally orchestral. The performances of the band were rendered in a manner that not only reflected the highest credit on the executants, but elicited the warmest applause of the audience.——On the 18th ult. the Albert Hall was well filled by a fashionable audience, on the occasion of a Concert given by the members of the band and the Sheffield squadron of the 1st W.Y. Yeomanry Cavalry. The bands of the Yeomanry and the 84th Regiment supplied the orchestral music, the vocalists being Miss Smythe, Mrs. Holt, and Mr. R. Hollins. Miss Smythe and Mr. R. Hollins were especially well received, and their several contributions encored. Mr. S. Suckley, the Bandmaster of the Yeomanry, and Herr Bonniseau, Bandmaster of the 84th, conducted; and the manner in which not only the solo passages, but the orchestral pieces generally, were gone through was highly appreciated. Mr. S. Suckley accompanied.

Sherborne, Dorset.—The Musical Union gave a Concert on Thursday evening, the 7th ult., at the Town Hall. The orchestra was filled with a large body of vocalists—about eighty in number—and the soloists were Mrs. R. Ensor, Mrs. F. Ensor, Mrs. Carr Glyn, Mr. Dudley Thomas, and Mr. Frank Thomas, Miss R. Curme presided at the piano, and Mr. Louis N. Parker, Associate of the Royal Academy of Music, conducted. The first part of the programme consisted of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Sacred Cantata, The Woman of Samaria. The Quartett, "God is a Spirit," was excellently sung by Mrs. R. Ensor, Miss F. Ensor, and the Messrs Thomas, and the audience accorded warm plaudits. The Choruses were almost faultless, the time, expression, and taking up of the parts being strictly observed throughout—the result of the careful, energetic, and persistent drilling by the Conductor at the practices. The second part consisted of selections, and included a Duet, "Come, let me lead thee," from Mr. Parker's Idyll, Silvia (well rendered by Mrs. R. Ensor and Mr. Dudley Thomas), and Schumann's "Gipsy Life."

Shildon.—The members of St. John's Church Choir gave a Concert of vocal and instrumental music in the National Schoolroom on Wednesday evening, the 20th ult. The Part-songs were well rendered by the members of the choir, showing the careful training of Mr. W. Dodds, the Choirmaster.

St. Louis, U.S.—Professor Malmene, the well-known musical Director, has been recently presented with a gold-mounted baton, on behalf of the members of the Druid Singing Society. The subscribers to the testimonial, appreciating Professor Malmene's efforts to improve their musical culture, appointed Messrs. H. W. Miche and L. Shellhemmer a Committee. Miss Annie Lorch delivered the presentation address, and the Professor made an appropriate response. The baton is inscribed, "Waldemar Malmene, Mus. Bac., Cantab.," and is in every respect a fine piece of work.

Stratford-on-Avon.—A Concert was given at the Town Hall on the 4th ult., at which the performers were Mr. Charles Hallé (pianoforte), Madame Norman-Néruda (violin), Miss St. Clair Taylor and Mr. S. Betjemann (vocalists). The programme included Beethoven's Moonlight and Kreutzer Sonatas; a Fantasie Caprice in A, by Vieuxtemps; Andante and Rondo in B flat (Dussek); and Barcarole in G, and Scherzo in D (Spohr), all of which were warmly received.—— On the 14th ult. the first Concert of the Choral Society was given at the Town Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of selections from Judas Maccabæus, Miss Woolley taking the soprano solos, the others being apportioned to members of the Society. The second part consisted of Part-songs, vocal solos by Miss Woolley and Miss Cox, and a pianoforte piece by Mrs. Luce. Miss Woolley gained an encore for her singing of "Should he upbraid." The accompaniment of Mr. Maries contributed in an essential degree to the success of the entertainment.

Sydney, N.S. Wales.—The third Concert of the present season in connection with the Civil Service Musical Society took place in October last in the Masonic Hall. The first part of the programme consisted entirely of selections from Bellini's Opera Norma, the vocalists being Miss Moon, Mr. John Bushelle, Mr. Hinchey, and two amateur members of the Society. The Conductor was Mr. D. Callen; Herr Kretschmann led the orchestra; and Mr. Banks presided at the pianoforte. This Society, which has now been in existence eleven years, possesses a good amount of musical ability, and is capable of greater development than has hitherto been attempted. Miss Moon and Mr. Bushelle, nephew of Wallace the composer, sustained their parts excellently. The second part opened with the March from Tannhäuser, which was vigorously performed by the band, and the Chorus attached to it was also well given. A determined encore followed. A violin solo by Herr Kretschmann was brilliantly performed, and loudly applauded. Altogether the concert was one of the best yet given by the Society, and great credit is due to the leading members, and particular praise to those who formed the choir.

Tunbridge Wells.—Morning and evening Concerts were given in the Calverley Assembly Rooms on Wednesday, January 30, when Francis Howell's new Cantata, Song of the Months, was performed, the composer acting as Conductor. The principal vocalists were Mrs. G. Gates, the Misses Knight, Mr. Albert James, and Mr. Musgrove Tufnail; there was an efficient band, with Mr. J. Barrett presiding at the piano. The Cantata, which contains several extremely pretty and effective items, received ample justice from the above-named artists, and the Choruses were rendered with great spirit. The second part of the programme consisted of songs, &c. A pianoforte and harmonium combined (designed and adapted by Messrs. Gates and Co.) proved very effective.

Westerham.—One of the best Concerts that has taken place at the Public Hall for some years past was that given on the 12th ult. by Mr. T. Chapman, of Croydon. The vocalists engaged were Miss Perfitt (of the Royal Academy of Music), Mr. J. B. Shakespeare, Mr. T. E. Warner, Mr. T. G. White, and Mr. W. V. Keen. A well-arranged programme had been prepared, and so admirably was every piece rendered that many were redemanded. Mr. T. Warner proved an efficient pianist, and the concert as a whole was highly satisfactory. The proceeds of the entertainment were devoted to the fund for the enlargement of the Westerham Infant Schools.

Weston-super-Mare.—The Amateur Choral Society (a new Society started last autumn) gave a performance of the Messiah at their first Concert on the 6th ult. The Society numbers over eighty voices, under the conductorship of Herr Sondermann, of Bath, and the manner in which the Choruses were rendered reflects great credit on all concerned. The Solos were taken by Mrs. Goldsmith, Mrs. Boyle, Miss Price, Miss A. Poole, Miss M. Price, Mr. Taylor (of Wells Cathedral), Mr. Norvill, Mr. H. F. Davies, and Mr. H. St. B. Goldsmith. Miss Poole presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Brownell, of Bath, at the harmonium.

Windsor.—A Pianoforte and Violin Recital was given in the Town Hall on the 2nd ult., by Mr. Charles Hallé and Madame Norman-Néruda. The performance was under the patronage of H.R.H. the Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, who was present. The programme was selected from the compositions of Beethoven, Handel, Dussek, Schumann, and Chopin; Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata" (piano and violin) elicited the loudest and warmest applause. Mr. Dyson, with whom the arrangements rested, sang two Songs, "The Lotos Flower" (Schumann) and "Twilight is darkening" (Kücken), with good effect. —— The third of Mr. Dyson's Classical Concerts took place on the 19th ult. An excellent programme was provided, containing selections from the works of Raff, Servais, Beethoven, Chopin, Leclair, and Schumann. The performers were Herr Morsch (pianoforte), Herr Wiener (first violin), Mr. Zerbini (viola), and Herr Daubert (violoncello). The execution of the various items was excellent, and was fully appreciated by the audience. The violoncello solo, Adagio and Rondo (Servais), played by Herr Daubert, was especially admired. The vocal music included "O Memory" (Leslie), excellently sung by Masters Lowe and Smith and Mr. Dyson.

Wolverhampton.—An excellent Concert was given by the members of the Festival Choral Society, on Wednesday evening, the 6th ult., at the Agricultural Hall. The programme was of a miscellaneous character, comprising instrumental and vocal selections of the highest class. Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé were the leading artists, and their performances were perfect. They were ably supported by Herr Straus (viola), and Herr Franz Néruda (violoncello). Vocal solos were sung by Miss Jessie Royd, and a number of Part-songs by the choir of the Society. The instrumental portion of the concert opened with a Quartett in E flat, by J. Rheinberger, every movement of which was skilfully given. Madame Néruda won honours by her execution of a Polonaise in A, by H. Wieniawski, accompanied by Mr. Hallé, in which her bowing was remarkable for its power and precision. Mr. Hallé's solos on the pianoforte—Minuetto Grazioso and Tambourin (Gluck and Hallé), and "Il Moto Perpetuo" (Weber)—exhibited the manipulative skill for which he is so celebrated. The Spohr Duet by Madame Norman-Néruda and Herr Straus was one of the most remarkable features of the concert. Miss Royd delighted the audience by her rendering of "The soldier tired" and other songs, receiving several encores. The part-singing was highly creditable. Mr. Stockley conducted, and Mr. Mann accompanied, with their customary ability.

Wood Green.—On Friday the 8th ult. the members of the choir and a few friends in the congregation of the Wesleyan Chapel presented the Organist and Choirmaster (Mr. T. H. Bird) with a handsome timepiece, accompanied with a flattering inscription, ornamentally written and framed. The presentation was made by the Rev. W. H. Cooper on behalf of the subscribers, and several of the trustees of the chapel spoke in eulogistic terms of the Organist, and bore testimony to the high esteem in which he was held by the officers and members of the church.

Wortley.—On the 21st ult. an Evening Concert, announced as the last of the season, was given in the Schoolroom before a large audience. The Sheffield Orpheus Quartett (Mrs. House, and Messrs. Berrisford, A. Wilson, and H. Makin) gave, in a highly artistic manner, several vocal pieces, many of which were encored. Master F. Beaumont (a youth of twelve years of age) displayed considerable ability in his rendering of two piano solos. Mr. J. Beaumont was the accompanist.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. John Barrett, jun., to Christ Church, Clifton.——Mr. F. W. Partridge, to Christ Church, Beckenham.——Mr. George Robert Bannister, to the Parish Church, Yalding, near Maidstone.——Mr. Charles Hall, to St. Clement's, E. Dulwich.——Mr. F. H. Taylor, Organist and Choirmaster, to St. Michael's and All Angels' Church, Caldmore, Walsall.——Mr. Frank Spinney, F.C.O., Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Royal Leamington Spa.——Mr. George Carr, Organist and Director of the Choir to Bloomsbury Chapel. —— Mr. Thomas Forward, to St. Giles's, Northampton.——Mr. Charles Winterbon, Organist and Choirmaster to St. James's Parish Church, Dover.

Choir Appointments. — Mr. H. R. Scott and Mr. B. Hamer (Tenors), and Mr. R. S. Thorpe (Bass), to St. Philip's, Kensington. ——Mr. Robert S. Meynell (Principal Bass), to St. Barnabas' Church, Kensington.

OBITUARY.

On January 22, in Dublin, Mrs. Alban Croft, aged 61.

On January 28, at Ventnor, after protracted suffering, Mr. A. D. Miles, A.R.A.M., Park Street, W., Professor of Music, for six years Organist and Choirmaster, St. Mark's, Grosvenor Square, London (formerly, for many years, of St. Mary's, Lutterworth), eldest son of Mr. G. Miles, Osmaston Street, Derby, in his 37th year.

On the 7th ult., at Beckington Academy, Bath (suddenly), Charles, eldest son of Mr. H. Millington, Organist of Trowbridge, aged 12 years.

"Barrow Street, Quorndon, near Loughborough,
"July 16, 1877.

"Sir,—It is now over two years since I purchased a set of your pedals and action for pianofortes. After having thoroughly tested them and used them regularly for so long a period I have no hesitation in saying that they are a most decided success, and at the same time advise every organ student who wishes to become proficient in the art of pedalling to procure a set of them at once.

"I remain, Sir, yours truly,
"To Mr. J. Hamilton." "J. J. CALLIS.

Orders accompanied with Cheque or P.O. Order will receive immediate attention. Send for prices to the Profession and Trade.

TO CHORAL SOCIETIES.

ORCHESTRAL PARTS.

Since the reduction in the price of music in 1849, by Mr. J. A. NOVELLO, Choral Societies have so rapidly grown up and developed that works requiring full orchestral accompaniments are now, rather as a rule than an exception, included in their public performances. Hitherto, however, the price of band parts has been so high that, instead of purchasing, it has been the custom to hire them whenever a composition demanding such aid has been given. In order to obviate the necessity of this, Messrs. NOVELLO, EWER and Co. have decided that in future all Orchestral Parts shall be marked at the uniform rate of Sixpence per Sheet, thus enabling Institutions to form a permanent library for the orchestra, as well as for the choir, at a small additional outlay.

NOVELLO'S OCTAVO EDITION

OF THE

Oratorios, Cantatas, Masses, &c.,

IN PAPER BOARDS.

The Works comprised in the above-mentioned series are now issued in paper boards, with cloth backs and gilt lettering, the price in each case being Sixpence above that of the edition in paper covers.

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

ALBERT LOWE'S

EASTER ANTHEM.

THE LORD IS MY STRENGTH. Short, easy, and effective. Octavo, 3d. "Mr. Lowe writes with the gravity and earnestness of a true composer for the Church. This little Anthem is well adapted to meet the wants of small choirs, and cannot fail of acceptance when looked at from the higher ground of religious edification. Moreover, it shows a thoroughly musicianly spirit, and that rare gift, the ars est celare artem."—Sunday Times.

"This Anthem amply fulfils the announcement on the title-page; it is 'short' and 'easy'—the subjects, moreover, being both melodious and well harmonised. The unexpected chord of B flat, after the lingering of the voices upon D, is a point worthy of attention; and the manner in which the harmonies flow towards the final close is well deserving of commendation. The Anthem will, we think, be found extremely useful."—Musical Times.

"Mr. Lowe has contributed to Church congregations and Choral Societies a 'short, easy, and full' Anthem, which is calculated to afford much satisfaction, and to be largely in request. The subject is treated in a truly devotional spirit, and with musicianly skill, and it is well harmonised."—News of the World.

"An excellent Anthem."—The Church Times.

SOUTHWELL SCHOOL SONGS. First series, 1s. 6d. By the Rev. R. F. SMITH, Minor Canon of Southwell.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Queen.—"Fourteen" (sixteen) "capital little songs in a cheap handy form. Quite new and withal pretty and neatly written."

The Schoolmaster.—"Easy, pleasing tunes, suitable to school use. The composer shows himself a true musician; each 'lay' has a separate tune, which is catching, appropriate, and quite in old ballad-song style."

The Musical Times.—"The sympathetic and musicianlike manner in which he has wedded them to melodies which cannot fail to please the young vocalists for whom they are expressly designed."

A DICTIONARY OF

MUSICAL TERMS

EDITED BY

J. STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.,

Magd. Coll., Oxford,

AND

W. A. BARRETT, Mus. Bac.,

St. Mary Hall, Oxford.

The following Gentlemen have contributed to this Work:—

Bosanquet, R. H. M., Esq., M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford.
Bulley, J., Esq., M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford.
Champneys, F., Esq., B.M., M.A., M.R.C.S., of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, late Radcliffe Travelling Fellow of the University of Oxford.
Chappell, W., Esq., F.S.A.
Donkin, A. E., Esq., M.A., F.R.A.S., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.
Ellis, A. J., Esq., B.A., F.R.S., F.S.A., F.C.P.S., F.C.P., Trinity College, Cambridge.
Gadsby, Henry, Esq.
Helmore, Rev. T., M.A.
Hullah, John, Esq.
McNaught, W. G., Esq.
Monk, W. H., Esq.

"Among articles which, though not absolutely indispensable in a Musical Dictionary, are well worth reading as treated in the Dictionary edited by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, may be mentioned 'applause' and 'dedication.' Indeed, apart from its high value as a work of reference, the Dictionary is interesting throughout."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, comes to supply the deficiency just at the time when people are waking up to the advantages of accuracy in all sorts of arts, and it is most welcome. Its title gives a very humble idea of its importance, suggesting rather dry definitions or technical explanations than what it really contains. The definitions and explanations are all there, and their multitude is truly astonishing, even the most out-of-the-way words receiving consideration; but besides this there is a great quantity of valuable essays, not only by the editors, but also by men well known to the public for successful labours in the field of music and acoustics, such as Mr. Hullah and Mr. Ellis, the translator of Helmholtz, and Mr. William Chappell and Mr. Helmore."—The Academy.

"A 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett (Novello, Ewer and Co.), deserves especial mention, as the first attempt to supply the English reader with something that is not a limited glossary of technical words, but an encyclopædic book of reference on matters musical, such as German and Italian students have for some time been fortunate enough to possess."—The Graphic.

"In addition to this, the editors have derived information from many other equally good sources, so that the work is as trustworthy as it is complete, and professional and amateur musicians will alike owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett for one of the most useful musical works ever produced."—Standard.

"It is the general character and tone of the volume that concerns general amateurs, who, at a little cost of time, can obtain from this volume information on theoretical and scientific subjects, without having to wade through complex works. The Dictionary displays careful research generally, and it is also imbued with an impartial spirit, which goes far to beget confidence in the writers. The book is illustrated with diagrams of instrumental workmanship, and is printed in very large and clear type."—The Athenæum.

GOLD MEDAL PIANOS.

18, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON, W. ON THE THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT. { "This most ingenious and valuable invention cannot fail to meet with success."
SYDNEY SMITH. "The touch is absolute perfection."
BRINLEY RICHARDS. { "A very clever and useful invention, and likely to be extensively adopted."

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"The tone of the Grand now referred to possessed all the qualities that a good piano ought to have, and in touch and action was perfect. The sweet and silvery quality of the upper octaves was worthy of special admiration."—The Era.

"Sir Julius Benedict played his well-known composition, 'Where the Bee sucks,' on one of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons' Grand Pianos, with the recently patented improvements, which enabled him to produce the sustained tones with great variety of effect in the light and shade of tones, especially so when extreme delicacy of touch is required."—Court Journal.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS. Six feet six inches in length, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. Price, 105 to 115 Guineas.

"Admirable repetition, perfect sostenuto, and luscious tone of the instrument fully justified the performer's choice."—Sunday Times.

"Magnificent, grand, the air telling out with almost vocal clearness and sweetness to the bell-like treble arpeggio accompaniment, which contrasted excellently with the extraordinary power produced in the forte passages."—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

"An immense improvement in arpeggios. The rapid passages in the upper register, the beautiful flute-like tone, and quick and perfect repetition, were very effective."—Figaro.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' CONCERT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"Sir Julius Benedict, now seldom heard as a soloist, delighted the public once more by his arrangement of 'Where the Bee sucks.' He played upon a new Patent Grand by Brinsmead, possessing a remarkably loud and clear tone."—Echo.

"The upright Iron Grand Piano, with sostenente sounding-board, the mechanism produces the obvious result of a fuller and richer tone."—Morning Advertiser.

"Every means are adopted to insure the production of perfect instruments."—The Orchestra.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' SHORT IRON GRAND PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action

"Where all the pianos go to seems somewhat of a mystery, for a really good instrument will last a lifetime: and yet every year thousands are made by each of the great London manufacturers, while the numbers made by the 200 or more smaller firms must represent an enormous number in the course of each year. The improvements made in English pianos have caused this trade rapidly to increase, until one pianoforte manufactory after another has been built to supply the growing demand. One of the largest of these, lately erected by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons, of Wigmore Street, covers nearly an acre of ground in the Grafton Road, Kentish Town, and is intended to accommodate 300 workmen. These works alone can supply 3,000 pianos annually, and there are at least three manufactories in London capable of making an equal number."—Illustrated London News.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"A metal bridge of a peculiar form is used to produce the treble, and a much finer tone is produced than if a wooden bridge were used."—Morning Post.

"A perfect check, great power, and quick repetition."—Times of India.

"Produces a better quality of tone, greater durability, the new patent perfect repetition, with a check (never before attained), with the certainty of the instrument never blocking."—Land and Water.

"Beautiful, light, and elastic touch, and an instant repetition."—Globe.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action.

"The softest touch is sufficient to secure a reply, the touch and facility of repetition are really perfect."—Belgravia.

"The advantages fully justify the term 'Perfect' Check Repeater Action."—John Bull.

"The touch is very sure, light, and elastic."—Musical Times.

"This invention is simplicity itself."—The Queen.

"The latest and greatest improvements in the pianoforte."—City Press.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action. On the Three Years' System.

"Receive the greatest approbation everywhere of musicians and manufacturers."—Standard.

JOHN BRINSMEAD and SONS' GOLD MEDAL PIANOS, with the Patent Perfect Check Repeater Action, from 33 to 300 Guineas. May be obtained of all the principal Musicsellers.

WITH CHECK ACTION, IN ELEGANT WALNUT OR ROSEWOOD CASE.

FROM 29 GUINEAS.

"The Pianettes manufactured by CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments."—Anton Rubinstein.

"I can testify in the strongest manner to the qualities of the Pianette as manufactured by CHALLEN & SON. In every point, as to tone and touch, they are excellent; and I can also certify from experience as to their durability under hard wear."—William Henry Monk, Professor of Music in King's College, London.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL SEMI-COTTAGE,

WITH CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 32 GUINEAS.

"The Pianos I have selected from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate."—William H. Cummings.

"As a customer of some years' standing, I speak with confidence of the quality of the instruments supplied by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON. The two I have for my own use have had a great deal of wear, and in this respect have entirely satisfied me as to their durability; and the tone and touch of all those selected by me for myself or pupils have been much commended."—Alfred Gilbert, R.A.M.

WARD'S
FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.

The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.

A LOST CLUE IN HARMONY.

By Joseph Green.

It must have occurred to any one who has examined the scientific treatises on music which have appeared in Germany and in England within the last few years that in the mode the various systems are explained in regard to some specific object, and reposing as they do on physical and mathematical facts, they are simply indisputable.

Why is it that musicians toss those systems aside one after the other? It cannot be that they are incapable of comprehending them. No one knows his own business better than does a musician. There must be some slight link wanting to unite the technical and scientific methods, as well as to reconcile the different theories of the musicians themselves.

What that missing link appears to be can be shown to some extent even in the limits allotted to an article in this periodical.

In the writings of most commentators* on the Greek system of music it will be observed that they strongly insist on the importance of two points. Firstly, the conjunct system of tetrachords; and secondly, power and position. As for the first, although it still affects the opinions of different schools of theorists, it is not the point in question, and is besides included in the more important matter, "power" and "position."

As a rule all scientists—that is, modern scientists—work their musical problems more or less in power. Whereas musicians unconsciously, or they would have told us more about it, work their problems principally in position. The consequence is, the scientist and the musician do not agree, and they cannot agree until the whole question referred to is more plainly set before us, and in a manner adapted to modern requirements.

M. Gevært, in his "History of Ancient Music," of which only one volume has yet appeared, gives us, in the modern notation, a diagram of Ptolemy's, with explanatory remarks translated from that author. In the extracts given Ptolemy not only puts in the clearest light the difference between power and position, but indicates partially what may be called the present system of inversion of sounds; and plainly, our system of transposing into modern notation and in relation to a normal tonic the Greek modes or the Church tones.

By way of illustrating the two methods of modulating explained by Ptolemy—firstly, the keyboard shift, which may represent the system of the "movable Doh;" and secondly, interval or melodic progression, representing to some extent the principle of the "fixed Doh"—we can resort to nothing better than to the Tonic Sol-fa system in England, or to the Galin-Paris-Chevé system as taught in France, and to the Greek modes as they are transposed by Helmholtz into the modern diatonic scales of C♮, A♭, B♭, &c.

When in the following explanations old terms and old facts reappear it is useless for people to say, "We knew it all before;" firstly, because we are most of us accustomed to that kind of criticism, and have learned to appreciate the moral and intellectual type from which it generally emanates; and secondly, if Gevært, who is one of the most accomplished musicians in Europe, chooses to refer to the subject of Ptolemy's remarks as a question which, as he says, "is to this day so little understood," we may be quite sure that if the facts are as old as history their modern application is still defective. Besides, we have all of us at hand the most recently published systems of harmony by our best musicians, and the most recent theoretical investigations of our scientists, and their litera scripta is evidence enough that the subject of this paper has been unaccountably overlooked.

All systems of music or notation, such as the Galin-Paris-Chevé, the Tonic Sol-fa, as well as those found in the older class of instruction-books on harmony, in which the relative minor is given as the exemplar of the minor mode, are revivals of the Greek octave system, and invented, as that system was, for the same purpose of simplification. In that intention, the systems of notation just mentioned are admirable, and will no doubt continue to succeed so long as they do not attempt to go beyond their specific object. When it is an affair of transposition, they should themselves show that as a rule they only employ one method, and that it is not so simple, or so expeditious, or even theoretically so true as the second method. Ptolemy, in the extract given by Gevært, thus describes both devices. He says, "There exist two principal methods of effecting a change of key. The first is that by which we employ the whole melodic scale in a higher or lower octave preserving the mutual relation of sounds. In the second the whole scale is not changed in pitch, but a part of it only changes its original order of consecutive intervals. On that account this method ought to be called change of melodic progression rather than change of key. According to the first method the melodic progression never changes, but the whole scale does. In the second method the melody changes, but the pitch does not change as a question of diapason, but only in regard to the altered notes in the scale." After explaining the double-octave system of conjunct and disjunct tetrachords, with A♮ in the centre as the mese of the system, and telling us that sometimes the sounds are named—or, as we should say, sol-faed—or numbered, according to their order in position in that double octave, as a, b, c, or 1, 2, 3; and sometimes in power, or specific relation to some other sound in the scale, as E♮, which would be renumbered 1, or treated as a new doh, he says: "Adapting the fifteen positions to the fifteen powers composing the non-modulating system (the double octave), and putting the normal system in power and position, the same notes of the scale receiving the denominations common to both, we then transpose the same powers to different positions." In modern phraseology, what Ptolemy means is this: Take our scale of C♮ in the double octave, and number it 1, 2, 3, 4, &c. It is then in power and position to the normal tonic 1, C♮. If we take any other sound, such as E♮, and number its scale or tetrachord—

it is in power to E♮; and inasmuch as in the octave system the numbers without accidentals as well as the alphabetical symbols still denote C♮, it is in position to the latter tonic. If we take Ptolemy's second method and number the tetrachord of E♮—

e, f, g, a
1, 2♭, 3♭, 4

the numbers are in power and position to E♮; and transposing them in power and position to the normal tonic, we get c, d♭, e♭, f.

* Particularly Mr. Chappell, "History of Music Art and Science."

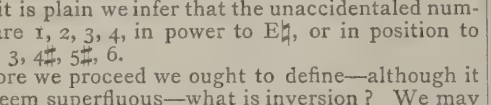
This Ptolemaic system of transposition shows that no system of notation will explain itself without the assistance of another. It is thus that we invent certain signs to be applied to the staff notation to show the ratios; or explain by the aid of that notation the Chevé system of numbering; or discover where we are standing in the Tonic Sol-fa notation by recourse to alphabetical symbols.

It is evident in this "second method" of Ptolemy's that whilst the "change of melodic progression" does not, as he says, shift the keyboard, it amounts in the modern system to the same thing when we have to transpose the numbers 1, 2♭, 3♭, 4, to the normal tonic to show any particular octave genus. Moreover those same numbers, whilst as symbols they suggest to the modern eye the key of A♭, discover by the accompanying alphabetical signs that the key we are manipulating is in reality that of E♮ major with four sharps. A♭ major and E♮ major are "reciprocals." A fact overlooked by the older commentators, who would tell us that the Greek system was purely an octave system of fifteen sounds; and even the most recent commentators have failed to see that by the principle of reciprocity we can get the sharp keys by the same system we get the flat keys. For if in the scale of C♮ we number the tetrachord e, f, g, a, 1, 2♭, 3♭, 4, it is plain we infer that the unaccidentaled numbers are 1, 2, 3, 4, in power to E♮, or in position to C♮, as 3, 4♯, 5♯, 6.

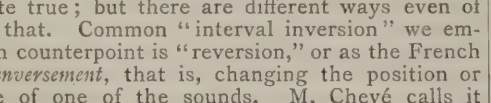
Before we proceed we ought to define—although it may seem superfluous—what is inversion? We may be told that it is only like the schoolboy's form of incantation, reading the scale backwards way. That is quite true; but there are different ways even of doing that. Common "interval inversion" we employ in counterpoint is "reversion," or as the French say renversement, that is, changing the position or octave of one of the sounds. M. Chevé calls it interversion.

As regards the scale, if we read the same intervals backwards way we get 1, 7♭, 6♭, 5, from 1, 2, 3, 4. That is, same intervals, different sounds. In the previous case it was, same sounds, different intervals.

Inversion is either functional—in power—or positional, according as we adapt the method to the notation; as in this diagram:*—



There is another species of inversion, if we can call it so, employed by Chevé and the old technical school. We may name it octave inversion. It is simply remaining in the scale and reading it backwards way in thirds whatever the thirds may be, as—



Of course there is no theory in such a method.

We are now prepared to take certain quotations to begin with from Galin ("Nouvelle Methode," 1818).

He discusses like a true philosopher the question whether harmony alone can fix the tonality, or whether melody also has not this privilege; and he draws attention to the obvious fact that the determination of key does not depend altogether on the sounds which are struck, but on the order in which they are sounded, and also to the equally undeniable fact that in singing the ascending or descending tetrachord the sense of tonality is lodged always on the last note. In other words the tonic is, as the Greeks put it, a point of convergence and not a point of departure. He modestly admits that in his time the laws had not been discovered which would account for the facts. In our time they have been discovered, or pretty nearly so, by Helmholtz; although, as he presents them, they are almost useless to musicians who work by a different method.

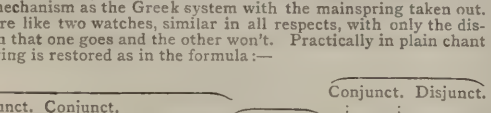
When Galin comes to the point as to how it is that in a major scale we get melodic forms which may be major or minor, or both, and nobody can say what, his method fails completely. Chevé, in trying to explain the same question as regards the resolution of the harmonies of the scale on any other sound but the tonic, makes matters infinitely worse. He says that in those cases "the ear perceives what is not present to the eye." He might as well have said at once that his system of notation was at an end as regards transposition or modulation within the scale. What he wanted to show, Ptolemy would have made clear to him in an instant.

It has already been suggested that, with due deference to Ptolemy, his two methods are pretty much the same. They both can be made to exhibit the principle of the "movable doh;" and by the second method with somewhat more condensed force than by the first. The difference is more a question of mechanism than theory. If the mechanical principle of the first method is that of the lateral shift in a groove, the principle of the second is that of a revolving cylinder which as it revolves registers the new tonic required or indicated by the resolution. That is to say, if we take what Chevé calls a chord of the fifteenth or of a thirteenth, in other words the diatonic scale arranged vertically and in thirds, and resolve any fragment—or tronçon, as he calls it—of that scale on any other sound but the tonic, the scale and of course its fragments, its triads and tetrads, twist round as on a pivot. If we resolve on A♮, the indicator says E♭; if we resolve on E♮, it says A♭, and so on.

To show the importance of these well-known facts and to avoid dissertation, it is better to allow our best authorities to exhibit their own notions in their own way.

Helmholtz ("Sensations of Tone," p. 283) says: "As the fundamental principle for the development of the European tonal system we shall assume that the whole mass of tones and the connection of harmonies must stand in a close and always distinctly perceptible relationship to some arbitrarily selected tonic, and that the mass of tone which forms the whole composition must be developed from this tonic and must finally return to it. The ancient world developed this principle in homophonic music, the modern world in harmonic music. But it is evident that this is merely an æsthetical principle, not a natural law."

* Average readers, like myself, will have seen in history books over and over again the Greek system of fifteen sounds, and will have smiled at it benignly as an old-world and primitive effort, well enough in the days when those wonderful things, flats and sharps, had not been invented. All I can say is this, that after spending some time in adapting Greek methods to our modern chord system, and not from a scholastic point of view, to which I have no pretension, but using only a common analytical method of working down from our own musical system to that of the Greeks, I remain in amazement at the subtlety and ingenuity of that simple-looking Greek scale. Whichever way we attack the question, from the most simple or most abstruse points of modern doctrine, we find the Greeks are there before us. If we have no documentary evidence to show they have done this or that, we can always see how they could have done it. The Church modes are the same mechanism as the Greek system with the mainspring taken out. They are like two watches, similar in all respects, with only the distinction that one goes and the other won't. Practically in plain chant the spring is restored as in the formula:—



Very true; but the "ancient world" developed the principle in a different fashion. As Helmholtz puts the matter, it is a kind of solar system, one of an infinite number; and on paper it represents a plane section. If we convert it into a scientific toy, once called an orrery, and attempt to work it, we shall find that, as musicians would say, "it won't go." The reason is obvious. As it stands, it represents a system of finals arranged as Mr Ellis perhaps would put it, or as any one would put it who is accustomed to work by inversion and transposition. It would consist of a vertical series of seven finals by fifths, the boundaries of which would be A♮, 27 : 16, and E♭, 32 : 27; and a transverse series of seven finals by thirds, the boundaries of which would be B sharp on one side, and D double flat on the other. As a "duodenal system," it is simply perfect. But musicians do not work with duads or with finals, but with the scales these finals represent developed, as Helmholtz would place them. There is, however, a slight difference in method. The subtle Greeks found out that difference at once. To tell us that they employed the Pythagorean system is, in the first place, untrue; and in the second, if it were true, it would amount to nothing. Their musicians made use of that system just as in practice we employ equal temperament; and for the same excellent reasons—reasons which impress us more and more as we investigate the complications of the subject. Like the modern double-octave system, equal temperament is a method of "simplification," with this advantage over its rival, that it is honest. It tells us at once that it is not true, and we must make the best of it.

If we apply the general tonic theory of Helmholtz as it stands, without further explanation, to the Church modes, what are we to do? Here we have inexpressively beautiful melodic forms, wisely adopted in liturgical music, perfectly satisfactory, and no tonic at all to speak of! The answer is plain. If we choose to present them in the double-octave system—that is, in power and position to an apparent tonic centre, be it C or F, our 7, 2, 4, 6, or tronçon, remaining 7, 2, 4, 6, our fahs and lahs remaining fahs and lahs, with all their original attributes or "mental effects" ascribed to them, the sense of the original tonality is lost, but the indication of the tonic remains in the mechanical symbolism. If we put the separate octaves in power and position, the sense of tonality and the symbols are changed. Our 7, 2, 4, 6 in C♮ become by a twist of the cylinder 5, 7♭, 2♭, 4 in E♮; or our firm tones may become infirm, our desolate tones piercing tones, and so on.* In short, by the Ptolemaic system of transposition, we find that if the central sun is still visible we are not obliged to return to it, as Helmholtz advises—and rightly enough, from his point of view; but we can rest in the octave system on the Doric final E♮, or the Phrygian final D♮, or on their inversions, A♭ or B♭, so long as it is the A♭ or B♭ developed from the centre. If we change one or the other, it is not so much a change of key as change of system or subsystem. In the modern sense we have already changed the key by transposition. The difficulties in that question the Greeks managed by their system of modes; and if we are even to approach just intonation, we must return to that system. But the just intonation is not merely a question of "thirds." It is, indeed, to a great extent a question of "fifths," but more particularly a question of scale. As Helmholtz himself might say, we must sacrifice the planetary eccentricities of intervals for the sake of the system.

In regard to ratio, if our original scale is the ordinary diatonic, the transpositions of the modes will be the same. It is evident Helmholtz implies that much when, after giving us with all his scientific zeal and sagacity the ratios of the Greek modes as far as they can be conjectured, he says (p. 412): "Hence, if we disregard the chromatic and enharmonic scales," &c., "homophonic music developed seven diatonic scales," &c. Then follows his table of modes, which, assuming the scale of C♮ (the mode of the first) to be the common diatonic, the rest are simply the diatonic scales of B♭, A♭, G, F, &c. In other words, if that assumption be correct, he confounds transposition with inversion, precisely what Ptolemy tells us not to do; or, as he would express it, not to confound his first method with his second method of change of key or mode. It is easy to do that, because in theory transposition and inversion are the same. And even in method they are the same, as regards the finals of the modes before they are again transposed to the normal tonic. But when we come to invert the whole scale it is a different affair.

For example, if we take the octave e—e in the ordinary diatonic scale of C♮ and transpose it, we get—

						Major Tone. $\frac{8}{5} \times \frac{9}{8}$
Octave.....	e	f	g	a	b	c	d	e
	1	2♭	3♭	4	5	6♭	7♭	1
Transposed	C	d♭	e♭	f	g	a♭	b♭	C
						1	2	3	&c. of A♭, with b♭ 9 : 5 to C♮.

But if we simply invert the diatonic scale of C♮, then, without more trouble, we get the scale of A♭ already transposed in power and position to C♮. By that process we get a scale of A♭ with a B♭ 16 : 9 inversion of 9 : 8, showing that it is qua position a mode of C♮, and not a transposed scale in power—that is, the scale of A♭ as a new doh!

In other words, if we number a scale 1, 2, 3, 4, and invert it as a normal scale—say C♮—it is in power and position.

If we apply the same process to the scale of F♮ it is the same thing in a different pitch; but following the excellent principle of the Tonic Sol-faists, if we call the F♮ fah we understand there is a new relationship to some antecedent fact, the normal tonic. In virtue of the sound being fah and not F♮ as a new doh, we number the scale of f, g, a, b♭, not 1, 2, 3, 4, but 4, 5, 6, 7♭ and then invert, and the scale is in position as a mode of C♮.* Nearly all questions are settled if on the strength of facts, historical as well as arithmetical, and on the strength of the practice and theory of some of the best of our living musicians—Gevært himself, I think, amongst the rest—and the subdued and inarticulate growls of nearly all musicians from Grétry upwards, we are allowed to assume that the normal scale is that formed on the conjunct system, G—C—F, the tetrachords being alike and in the ratios usually adopted. If we call that the tone (or key) and call the ordinary diatonic or harmony scale the mode (an octave in the Dorian and disjunct system), then the doh mode gives by inversion the true "mode of the sixth," or Dorian (not a diatonic scale of A♭); and the fah tone gives note for note, ratio for ratio, our tonic minor scale, rightly called minor key, with the B♭ 16:9, not an octave in the scale of E♭ with a B♭ 9:5, which a modern educated musician will reject, as a Greek would have done. The bad fifth with the E♭ is of no moment compared to the true fifth with the F♯, one of the fixed sounds in the normal system, itself a sub-system in the solar arrangement Helmholtz so well explains. If it is a right presentment of his system of modes to consider them all diatonic scales, then Helmholtz abandons his own italics, and apparently because he works in power and not also in position, as musicians do instinctively.

* The elementary effects at the disposal of the musician are the fifths—perfect, imperfect, and chromatic. With those intervals all chords of any kind can be built up. They cannot be built of thirds. The rest is a question of combination, inversion, and change of effect and contrast by change of pitch and contiguity. What is the mental effect of fah in C to F upwards? Evidently that of soh to doh. To exhibit the desolate effect of fah we must begin on the dominant (that is in position), as soh-te-ray-fah....., and even then the effect depends on the resolution. The elementary mental effects comprised in the triad, major, minor, augmented and diminished, will exhibit themselves by the twist of the scale if we only stay where we are (on the dominant) instead of skipping about the double octave.

* The scales inverted in position are those formed on the tetrachordal sounds 1, 4, 5. Those formed on thirds or sixths are in our system inverted in power as a general rule.

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

By William H. Cummings.

On page 67 of his book, Clark says, "I shall now proceed to prove that Dr. Bull composed the music of 'God save the King' before the year 1613, by the following extract from the old Cheque-book, now at the King's Chapel, which states: In 1613 John Bull, Doctor of Musique, went beyond the seas without licence, and was admitted into the Arch-Duke's service, and entered upon pay there about Mich.; and Peter Hopkins, a base, from Paul's, was sworne into his place the 27 of December following: his wages from Mich. unto the day of swearing-in of the said Peter Hopkins, was disposed of by the Deane of his Majesty's Chapel." Clark adds, "It is not at all probable that he (Bull) should have written any music in honour of the King of England, after having been discharged from the Chapel; he therefore must have composed it previously." Admitting that Bull composed an air with variations called "God save the King," but which has nothing in common with our National Anthem, as I shall presently show, I fail to see why he should not have written it after he had quitted the King of England's service and become one of the musicians in the court of a friendly prince. Bull had a son whom he was anxious to get admitted in the King's chapel, as is proved by a letter in Bull's autograph still extant, and he had therefore every reason for endeavouring to secure the favour of James I., a monarch generally credited with a great liking for flattery and adulation. Clark's crowning proof now comes before us. He says, "The following extract from the manuscript music of Dr. Bull will prove beyond a doubt that he did compose the music of 'God save the King.'" In Ward's lives of the Professors of Gresham College, published in London, 1740, we read as follows: "There is extant a large number and variety of Dr. Bull's pieces in manuscript that make up a part of the curious and valuable collection of music, now reposited in the library of Dr. Pepusch; of which I shall here add the following account, as communicated to me by the Doctor." Clark then copies from Ward's account the index to a large folio of music "for the organ or harpsichord," also of a second volume, large quarto, but as these contain nothing to the point I shall pass them over and come to the third volume quarto, of which the index stands as follows:—

Folio.
1. Præludium to the fantasia, Felix namque offertorium.
1. Fantasia, Felix namque offertorium.
8. Galliard, Madamoyselle Charlotte de la Haye.
15. Tres voces in unum, Salvator mundi.

116. Den lustelycken Mey, imperfect.

Clark proceeds to say, "Here then (on folio 56) is a positive, incontrovertible, and undeniable claim by Dr. Bull to the tune of 'God save the King,' as composed by him in honour of King James the First. It must be the same tune which is sung at the present time." This was a strong assertion to make and an unfortunate one, Clark never having seen the volume to ascertain what the music really was like. Fortunately the identical book was then in the possession of Dr. Kitchener, a medical man by profession, but also an enthusiastic musical amateur of moderate musical ability, who, excited by Clark's account, examined folio 56 of Bull's MS., and finding Clark's statement wholly untrue, he employed Edward Jones, the well-known musical antiquary and harpist, to make a copy of the music, which Dr. Kitchener published in 1823 with the following note: "This is an accurate copy of the 'God save the Kinge' mentioned in the above index, which Mr. Edward Jones, Bard to the King, was so obliging as to transcribe, putting it at the same time into our modern notation. Dr. Bull's, being on six-line staves with a multiplicity of clefs, in its original form was illegible, except by a musical antiquary, and too complicated to be playable without such an arrangement." The editor briefly remarks that "Dr. John Bull's composition is a sort of ground or voluntary for the organ, of the four notes C, G, E, F, with twenty-six different basses! and is no more like the anthem now sung than a frog is like to an ox." The composition consists of 119 bars, and is printed in full. The commencement is as follows:—

"GOD SAVE THE KINGE."

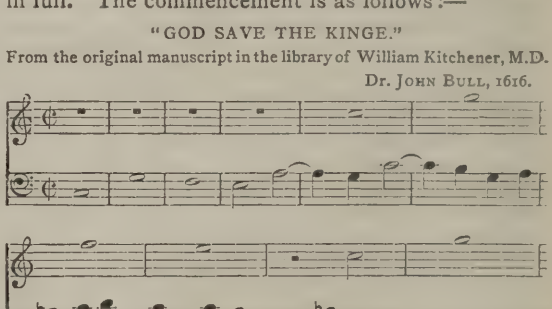
Dr. John Bull, 1616.



It is important to notice the date given, 1616, for although this is not appended to folio 56 in Ward's index, the omission, for which Dr. Pepusch is responsible, was probably accidental; this certainly was the case with one of the Bull volumes referred to and described in Ward's list, which having recently personally examined, I have detected an omission of no less than twelve dates. If then the date of the composition be 1616, it could not possibly have been performed at the Merchant Taylors' Hall in 1607. One would have supposed that the publication of Dr. Kitchener's evidence would have sufficed not only to have convinced Clark of the blunder he had made, but also to have kept him silent; he however seems to have accepted the fact that the tune was not what he had described, but at the same time he endeavoured to cover his retreat by venturing on the following assertion: "The ground lately produced by Dr. Kitchener, composed by Dr. Bull, bearing the title of 'God save the King,' proves what I have before stated, that the first naming a tune or piece of music in honour of the king was by Dr. Bull."

It will be seen that the above tune composed by Dr. Bull, under the title of "God save the King," may be taken to represent either a chant to the four words, or a musical embodiment of the cry of the populace. The short phrase "God save the King" must have been in frequent use in the house of God, in the palace, and in the streets, from the time of King Solomon downward.*

From the year 1823 the question of the authorship of "God save the King" frequently cropped up in the public journals, and at length the Gentleman's Magazine of 1836 devoted several articles to its consideration, and finally closed with the following sentence: "We are therefore arrived at the close of our inquiry, and the result appears to be that the original music of "God save the King" was an anthem prepared by Purcell or Blow for the Chapel of James the Second."

This brought Clark again into the front of the fight, and in August, 1837, he published a short pamphlet addressed "to the lovers of research, the historian, and the impartial critic." It will be unnecessary to say much of this extraordinary production, excepting that Clark roundly asserts "no doubt the melody was as popular then (in Purcell's day) as it is at this time," and that Purcell had avowedly imitated Bull's melody.† He adds, "A continuation on this subject nevertheless will shortly appear. In the meantime, R. Clark respectfully assures his Royal, Noble, and Honourable Subscribers, and especially the Master, Wardens, and Court of Assistants, of the Worshipful Company of Merchant Tailors, that his former account is correct, and that the National Anthem and National Grace, 'Non nobis Domine,' were written in Latin by Ben Jonson to please King James the First, he being considered a good Latin scholar, and were first sung in their Hall." I have already examined the truth of most of the foregoing myth, and do not think it worth while wasting many words over the supposition that Ben Jonson wrote the first verse of Psalm cxv., "Non nobis Domine! non nobis, sed nomini Tuo da gloriam." After this publication of Clark's (1837) there seems to have ensued a short truce, but the subject was reopened by a letter of inquiry addressed to a musical journal, September, 1839, whether written from a spirit of mischievous fun or really from a desire for more accurate knowledge it is now impossible to conjecture, but certain it is there soon followed letters from John Parry and others, notably Dr. Rimbault, who dealt mercilessly with Clark's unwarranted assertions. Matters became more complicated by the appearance in the Musical World (November 21, 1839) of a remarkable letter signed James Henry Saville, of Bishopsgate Street Within; it detailed the discovery of certain curious old hymns or songs of the time of Henry VII., on the subject of "Long lyve ye Kinge" and "Godde preserve ye Kinge," and on the following 12th of December the excitement was intensified by the publication of the following:—

Sir,—I beg to trouble you with the following account of a very curious manuscript I have lately come into the posssesion of. In my preambles about town I had occasion (feeling hungry) to go into a cheesemonger's shop in the neighbourhood of Clerkenwell to purchase a piece of cheese; perceiving that the shopman had served the little girl with some butter wrapped up in a piece of music in manuscript, I asked him if he had any more music of that kind; he stated that he had had a great quantity that he purchased for waste-paper, some written and some printed, and produced the one I am now about to describe, which was the last he had left, which he said if it was of any use to me I might have; the paper is very old, about the time of James or Charles I., one side is blank, with the following number at the corner, 141. On the side which is not paged is the music, the staves have five lines, but on the music side a sixth had been added with the pen; at top is written the "King's Anthem," "Dr. Bull." For a long time I was not able to make these words out, except the words "King's" and "Dr. Bull," which are plain enough; but on account of the h in the other words being carried down like a y it puzzled me for some time; at the beginning of the stave is the sign for common time, with a dot and a figure of three underneath it: the music is barred with six minims in a bar for the first seven bars only, which seven bars contain the tune of our present "God save the King," only the tune appears to be different to that which is played now; the tune has harmony to it, either for the organ, or as I suppose another keyed instrument (perhaps the virginal, as I have heard of such an instrument), but as I only play the fiddle a little I am not sufficiently able to judge. Underneath the first bar (with the aid of a glass), for the writing is so small it can scarcely be traced with the naked eye, is the following words: "God save oure mightye Kinge." After the first seven bars, which contain the whole of the tune, there is other music, apparently in a different time, beginning with the words, "In the O Lorde." There is not the whole of the anthem, but in the whole page, containing twelve staves, there are thirty-four bars very closely written, and very full (I mean of harmony). The tune of "God save the King" is in the key of G, with the sharps placed before the notes. Should anybody wish to see it I shall be happy to forward it to your office, if you will put a notice to that effect in your answer to correspondents.—Yours,

Thomas Hunter.

* I am indebted to my friend Mr. Wm. Chappell for the following curious note, now first printed: "Entered at Stationers' Hall to Master Marriott, 29th March, 1639, a sermon, called 'God save the King,' by Henry Valentine, D.D. Preached at St. Paul's on 27th March, 1639."

† We shall consider how far any music by Purcell resembles "God save the King" hereafter.

By Charles K. Salaman.

Dancing, songs, and instrumental music were the very essence, so to speak, of the ancient May festivities of England. Every town and village green had its permanent maypole, around which gathered, in the genial May season—and on all occasions of merriment and festivity—the lasses and lads of the place and its surrounding neighbourhood, to sing, to dance, and divert themselves with the national sports and pastimes of the period. "The evening dances on the village green," says Chappell, "were from Whitsuntide to Lammas-day. Harvest was then close at hand, and with harvest came rejoicings from farm to farm. Christmas furnished its indoor amusements and dances; Easter its holiday gambols. Musicians were in request at fairs, and especially so on the famous old May-day, which, corresponding with our 13th of May, was more genial to outdoor amusements than May-day according to the new style." Then, indeed, was "Old England" merry, and the people were contented and happy. They had few wants, and fewer cares. The institution of maypoles decorated with garlands of flowers is supposed to have had a heathen origin. In 1598 there was one standing in Cornhill. On the 1st of May, 1663, Samuel Pepys noted down in his famous "Diary," that he witnessed Morris-dancing in Leadenhall Street, which he had not seen for a great while; and that he set up his horse in order to enjoy it. From Douce's dissertation on the old English Morris-dances we learn that "both English and foreign glossaries concur in ascribing that dance to the Moors." Strutt, another eminent antiquarian, makes no doubt that the Morris-dance, which afterwards became exceedingly popular in this country, originated from the "fools' dance," and thence he traces the bells which characterised it. Hawkins says that to dance a "Morisco, is a term that occurs in some of our old English writers." This fact appears to have confirmed him in the opinion that the Morris-dances originated with the Moors. Ritson says: "The Morris-dance is supposed to have been originally derived from the Moorish-dance." When performed around the maypole on May-day, the Morris-dance —or, as it is sometimes spelt, Morrice-dance—consisted of the May Queen, the Jester or Fool, and about ten or twelve dancers, accompanied by the Piper and Taborer. At the Robin Hood pageants there was a larger assemblage of dancers, which included Robin Hood, Little John, Friar Tuck, and Maid Marian, and sometimes a Bishop and a Beggar. Ritson, in his "Notes and Illustrations to the Life of Robin Hood," says: "Some of the principal characters of the Morris seem gradually to have disappeared, so that at length it consisted only of the dancers, the Piper, and the Fool." It may be here mentioned that the more ancient "Fools' dance," of which Strutt gives a delineation—taken from a very ancient illuminated manuscript in the British Museum, —was accompanied by the regal—a small portable organ, and a bagpipe. In a scene of "Jack Drum's Entertainment," an old play, first printed in 1601, "The tabor and pipe strike up a Morrice. A shoute within: 'A lord! a lord! a lord! who?'" (This was a usual cry on occasions of mirth and jollity.)

Ed. Oh, a Morrice is come: observe our country sports. 'Tis Whitson-tyde, and we must frolick it.

THE SONG.

Skip it, and trip it, nimbly, nimbly,
Tickle it, tickle it lustily.
Strike up the tabor for the wenches' favour,
Tickle it, tickle it lustily.
Let us be seen on Hygate Greene,
To dance for the honour of Holloway.
Since we are come hither, let's spare for no leather,
To dance for the honour of Holloway.

(The Morrice sing, dance, and exeunt.)

The county of Norfolk was famous for Morris-dancing about two centuries and a half ago. Will Kemp, an actor and celebrated Morris-dancer, danced a "Morris" from London to Norwich in nine days, of which "wonder" he published, in 1600, an account, "to satisfy his friends," under the following title:—"Kemp's nine daies wonder performed in a daunce from London to Norwich. Contaynynge the pleasure, paines, and kind entertainment of William Kemp, between London and that city in his late Morrice, &c." On the title-page is the figure of the author attired as a Morris-dancer, "preceded by a fellow with a pipe and drum, whom he calls Thomas Sly, his taberer." In a curious old black-letter tract, published in 1609 by William Rowley, dramatist, entitled, "A Search for Money, or the lamentable complaint for the losse of the wandring knight Mounsier l'Argent; or, come along with me, I know thou louest money; Dedicated to all those that lack money," there is an allusion to Kemp's famous Morris-dance: "Yee have been either eare-or-eye-witnesses, or both, to many madde voiages made of late yeares, both by sea and land, as to travell to Rome with the return in certain daies, the wild Morrise to Norrige, the fellowes going backward to Barwick, another hopping from Yorke to London; and the transforming of the top of Paules into a stable, &c."

The Morris-dance was performed by young men without their coats, and with their shirts and other garments decorated with ribbons of various colours, and with bells of various tones attached to their caps, knees, and feet. The tinkling of the bells, together with the sounds from the lively pipe, and the measured beat of the tabor, animated the spectators no less than the dancers. The "Staines Morris-dance" tune may be specially named as one of the most melodious and characteristic among the many spirited Morris-dances extant. It is to be found in Chappell's "Popular Music of the Olden Time," charmingly harmonised by Professor Macfarren, who is always in sympathy with England's national music.

In Playford's "Dancing Master," which, in a little more than half a century, passed through eighteen editions, the first of which appeared in 1652, there are hundreds of dance tunes in almost every possible measure adapted for dancing, with full directions as to the method of performing every dance. Many of these fine old characteristic English tunes have been rescued from oblivion by Mr. William Chappell, Professor Macfarren, and the late Dr. Rimbault, to whom Englishmen owe a large debt of gratitude, not only for the revival and preservation of the tunes, and for presenting them to the public in an intelligible and acceptable form, but for dispelling an illusion, and disturbing a fallacy which has too long prevailed, that England does not possess a national music. I would refer those who may be interested in tracing the dates, and other particulars relating to our prolific repertory of fine old English dance music, to the notes of the compiler and editor, with which Chappell's "Popular Music of the Olden Time" is richly furnished.

To trace the extensive influence which dancing has exercised upon every kind of instrumental and vocal music is a study of considerable interest. The instrumental music of ancient times, with the exception of preludes and fantasias, canons and fugues, consisted of dance measures pure and simple, or music of the same kind varied in restricted harmony, or by passages in the dry fashion of the age. In the sixteenth and early part of the seventeenth century, the harmonies and passages were written in the diatonic scale, so that the variations in modulation were slight, and consisted principally in certain devices in imitation, more notable for pedantry than for elegance and beauty. As the art progressed, and the chromatic scale became more mingled with the diatonic, monotony gradually yielded to an increase of charm both in melody and harmony, and in the invention of passages of a more varied character.

The instrumental solos of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and early part of the eighteenth centuries, composed for the popular musical instruments of the period—the virginals, clavichords, spinet, single and double harpsichord, called in Italy spinetto and cembalo, in France épinette and clavecin, in Germany Clavier, and the theorbo, lute, and violin—consisted of short movements composed in the measure, and called by the names, of the respective popular dances of various countries in Europe, to which reference will presently be more particularly made. Christopher Simpson, in his "Compendium of Practical Music," informs us, that, with the exception of fantasias and symphonies, instrumental music, in its several kinds, was derived from the various measures in dancing. The composers who played upon and wrote for the several musical instruments above mentioned were the following: In Italy—Girolamo Cavazzoni, Luzzascho Luzzaschi, Claudio Merulo, Girolamo Diruta, Giuseppe Guami, Annibale Paduano, Andrea and Giovanni Gabrielli, Frescobaldi, Bernadino Pasquino, Alessandro and Domenico Scarlatti, Benedetto Marcello, Gian Battista Martini, Durante, Porpora, Corelli, Tartini, Geminiani, Hasse, Pescetti, Galuppi, and Paradies; in England during the same period—Tye, Tallis, Byrde, Bull, Orlando Gibbons, Dowland, Wilbye, Weelkes, Morley, Munday, Giles Farnaby, Blithman, Peter Phillips, Robert Johnson, Richard Farnaby, Tisdall, Hooper, Edward Johnson, Henry Lawes, Ford, Henry Purcell, Arne, Avison, Blow, and others; in Germany—Froberger, Kuhnau, Muffat, Buxterhude, Jean-Gaspard de Kehl, John Sebastian Bach, Friedman, and Emanuel Bach, Handel, Nichelmann, John Phillip Sack, Marpurg, Gluck, &c.; in France—Louis Couperin, Chambonnières d'Anglebert, L. Bègue, Rameau, François Couperin, Lully, Mondonville, and others.

In 1607 Thomas Forde published in London, "Musicke of sundre kindes set forth in two books, &c. . . . The second are Pavens, Galiards, Almaines, Toies, Jiggs, Thumpes, and such like, for two basse viols, the liera way, so made as the greatest number may serve to play alone, very easy to be performed." The Thumpes here mentioned was not the dance called Dump, or Dompe, which was a melancholy one. William Corkine published also in London, in 1610 and 1612, in two parts, "Ayres to sing and play to the Lute and Basse Violl, with Pavins, Galliards, Almaines, and Corantes for the Lyra Violl."

The following are the principal dance measures, sometimes called "ayres" or "airs" (a term derived from Italy), which were used by the instrumental composers of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and early part of the eighteenth centuries, sometimes alone, and later in a collection of lessons with a prelude, called suites de pièces. The titles were variously spelt at different periods and in different countries, but, despite their orthographic variations, they are always to be recognised. These airs are the Pavan, Saraband, Galliard, Chaconne, Coranto, Bourrée, Passepied, Passecaille, Passamezzo, Louvre, Menuet, Gavotte, Rigadoon, Tambourin, Ballet, Siciliana, Rondeau, Canaries, Jig or Giga.

John Dowland, the famous lutenist—Shakespeare's friend—published, about 1603, a work with the following title: "Lachrymæ, or Seven Teares, figured in seven passionate Pavanes, with divers other Pavanes, Galiardes, and Allemandes set forth for the Lute, Viols, and Violins, in five parts." The Pavan, a grave and majestic dance, is supposed to have derived its name from pavo, a peacock, and to be of ancient Spanish origin. The Italians also lay claim to the invention of this dance as derived from Padua. It was a favourite measure of Francis I. and Henry VIII.—suited to kings and queens. It was performed by princes in their mantles, by ladies in gowns with long trains, the motion whereof in the dance resembled that of a peacock's tail; barristers performed the dance in their wigs and gowns; unprofessional gentlemen in full dress, with cap and sword. The Pavan is a slow, dignified movement in four minims, or four crotchets in a bar—a kind of slow march. It was succeeded by a dance of a lighter character in triple time called a Galliard.

In ancient times, in England and elsewhere, men of the gravest character did not deem it inconsistent with their professions to dance. The judges, in compliance with an ancient custom, danced annually on Candlemas-day in the hall of the late Serjeants' Inn. Sir William Dugdale, alluding to the ancient revels at Lincoln's Inn, says: "And that nothing might be wanting for their encouragement in the excellent study (the law), they have anciently had dancings for their recreation and delight. . . . Nor were these exercises merely permitted, but thought very necessary, as it seems, and much conducing to the making of gentlemen more fit for their books at other times; for by an order made 6th February, 7 Jac., it appears that the junior barristers were, by decimation, put out of commons for example's sake, because the whole bar gave offence by not dancing on Candlemas-day preceding, according to the ancient order of this society, when the judges were present: with this, that if the like fault were committed afterwards they should be fined or disbarred." Specimens of the ancient style of Pavan and Galliard are to be seen in Stafford Smith's "Musica Antiqua;" in "Parthenia," the first book of virginal music ever printed, by William Byrde, John Bull, and Orlando Gibbons, the three most eminent masters of the period—1611; and in other works by the early English composers. It was usual to distinguish Pavans, Galliards, Corantos, and other dance measures, by associating them with the names of noted persons—thus: "King Harry the 8th's Pavyn;" "The Emporse Pavyn;" "The Earl of Salisbury's Pavan;" "Mr. John Langton's Pavan;" "The Earl of Essex, his Galiard;" "Captaine Piper, his Galiarde;" "Mr. George Whitehead, his Almand;" "Mr. Bucklon, his Almand." The Saraband, or Zarabanda, is a Spanish dance of great antiquity, derived from the Moors when they inhabited Spain. From that country it spread throughout Europe. It is a very slow dance, and the music is generally marked adagio; it should be a very expressive movement. As an additional proof of the Moorish origin of the dance, Sir John Hawkins states that a Saraband, danced by a Moor, was constantly a part of the entertainment at a puppet-show. It was danced to the accompaniment of the castanets, an instrument of percussion truly Moorish, formed of the wood of the chestnut tree—castaña. We are told that when, in the seventeenth century, Hamet-ben Hadji, the Moorish ambassador, visited England, an English beauty danced a Saraband before him, accompanying herself with "a pair of castanets in each hand, and that his Excellency was so entranced with her performance, and probably also by her beauty, that, as soon as she had concluded the dance, he ran towards her, took her in his arms, and kissed her, protesting that she had almost persuaded him he was in his own country."

The Saraband is usually the second measure in a suite de pièces. It is written in triple measure, either three minims or three crotchets in a bar, the last minim or crotchet being longer by a dot than the first. In Handel's first Opera, entitled "Almira," composed by him at Hamburg in 1703, there is a Saraband, the original of the very melodious air, "Lascia ch' io pianga," which, eight years later, he introduced into "Rinaldo," the first Italian Opera he produced on the London Italian stage. The vocal version of this expressive melody differs but slightly from the original instrumental composition. The first few bars of the introduction to Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont" is of the same measure as a true Saraband. The ancient dance measures are again becoming familiar to musical ears since the revival of a taste for the fine old virginal, harpsichord, and violin music of Handel, John Sebastian Bach, Corelli, Tartini, Rameau, and other great masters of the seventeenth, and early part of the eighteenth centuries. After a long period of fulness, and perhaps of an exuberance of wealth in composition, a return to simplicity of form becomes as welcome as it is refreshing and invigorating to the spirit of a conscientious composer. The fine old dance measures of our musical ancestors, which have offered valuable suggestions to the great masters who flourished towards the end of the last, and in a part of the present century, may once more present ideas to more modern masters in composition, whose genius may possibly again develop them into great and enduring works, and perhaps invest them anew with hitherto undiscovered features. The dance measures of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries will remain a standing protest against such modern compositions as are "without form, and void,"—music-chaotic, confused, and without grace and beauty.

The Chaconne was a famous dance of old Spanish-Moorish origin. Some have traced it to Persia and its name to shach—or shah—a king, and from thence it has been termed a royal dance. Its musical measure is bold and noble. It consists of four bars in slow triple time, which are varied without limit. The Chaconnes of Bach and Corelli for the violin, and those of Handel and François Couperin, are magnificent specimens of the measure. A Chaconne is to be found in Purcell's Opera of "Dioclesian," in four parts. The Passecaille, or Passacaglio, resembles it in some respects, being a short air with variations. They are both composed in the minor mode. In Handel's seventh suite de pièces for the harpsichord is a fine specimen of the Passecaille. The Passepied is a kind of quick minuet, usually written in three quavers in a bar. A Paspe is also to be found in Purcell's Opera just named. It is a brisk French dance, and was invented in Bretagne. In Playford's "Dancing Master," the seventeenth edition, there is a specimen of this dance measure, called also "A Paspe," written in $\frac{2}{4}$ measure, in fifteen bars; the first part ending in the dominant of the key, C. The dance is headed, "Longways for as many as will," which indicates a kind of country dance. At the foot are full directions how to perform the dance, which to me appear to be very complicated. Ferdinand Hiller and Edward Silas have composed some charming Passepieds, in which they have preserved the true character of the dance measure without a particle of plagiarism. The Passamezzo was a kind of indolent walking—something like the more modern quadrille. The Allemande was a production of Germany. Sir John Gallini, in his "Treatise on the Art of Dancing," describes the manner of its performance a century ago. He says: "Each man, holding his partner round the waist, makes her whirl round with almost inconceivable rapidity: they dance in a grand circle, seeming to pursue one another, in the course of which they execute several leaps, and some particularly pleasing steps when they turn, but so very difficult as to appear such even to professed dancers themselves. When this dance is performed by a numerous company, it furnishes one of the most pleasing sights that can be imagined." The Allemande is always the first movement in a suite de pièces. The Allemandes by Handel, Bach, Couperin, Martini, Corelli, Geminiani, and Rameau, are fine specimens of this class of composition. They are generally in the minor mode, and are characterised by much sentiment combined with dignity; although the constant flow of semiquavers when written in four crotchets in a bar, and quavers, when written in four minims, might appear to deprive it of sedateness of character. There are many specimens of Allemandes—called severally, Almands, Almaines, Almans—to be found in Stafford Smith's and Dr Crotch's specimens of ancient music, written in a different manner from the Allemandes of the great harpischord performers.

The next dance measure to be named is the Coranto, or Corante, or Courante. As its designation implies, it was a kind of running dance. It was very fashionable in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, and the specimens of the dance measure by the great masters of the olden time are numberless. Cardinal Aldobrandini, in his "Diary," gives an account of the festivities consequent on the espousals of Mary de Medicis with Henry IV. of France at Florence in 1600, when, by the way, was performed the first Opera in Italy—the "Orfeo," by Jacopo Peri. The Cardinal says: "The king began with the queen a Chiarentana, then followed a Galiardo; next came a Coranto, in which the gentleman, nearly running, leads his lady round in a circle and to the place where he wishes to set her. Here he seizes her, lifts her somewhat from the ground, and at the moment when she again stands on her feet, she is hurried on in a similar course by another partner. The gentlemen at last take their ladies under their arms, turn round in narrow circles, and lift them from the ground in time to music. The king took part only in the first dance, moving and dancing and following the music with gesture and position." The Lord Commissioner Whitelock, in the reign of Charles I., composed a Coranto which was very popular for thirty years. Charles II. was passionately fond of dancing and music. His knowledge of music was not extensive, but he could sing from notes with a voice which is described as a "plump bass." A letter written by him from Bruges to his friend Henry Bennett, afterwards the Earl of Arlington, contains the following directions: "Pray get me pricked down as many new Corantos, Sarabands, and other little dances as you can, and bring them with you; for I have got a small fiddler who does not play ill upon the fiddle." The musical measure of the Coranto is in three crotchets in a bar, or in three minims, with a constant flow of quavers or crotchets according to the time-signature of the composition, which may be written either in the minor or major mode. There are so many charming Corantos, pathetic, melodious, and elegant, in the suites de pièces of François Couperin, surnamed "Le Grand," of Handel, Henry Purcell, Sebastian Bach and his sons, Friedmann and Emanuel Bach, Gian Battista Martini, Rameau, Corelli, and others, that it is almost invidious to draw special attention to any one in particular. It was evidently a favourite measure with the old composers. The spirit and grace of the old Coranto measure is preserved in the minuet-movement in Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony." It may be traced also in many of the compositions of the great symphony-writers. The Lavolta, the precursor of the German Waltz, is mentioned by Massinger, and other dramatists of Shakespeare's time.

The Jig has always been a popular dance, and a popular musical measure in every European country. It is said to be of pure British origin. The measure has been very generally adopted by all the great composers of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries. It was generally written in $\frac{6}{8}$, or $\frac{3}{8}$, or $\frac{12}{8}$ measure. It was usually the final movement in a suite de pièces, and was often introduced by Handel into his Overtures, whether secular or sacred. "Rejoice greatly," in the "Messiah," in its original form, was a vocal Jig. The passages were subsequently altered from triplets in quavers to four semiquavers. In a very early score it may be seen in both ways, the altered mode being, with other modified numbers, in an appendix. The Irish Jig is too familiar to require any comment. It is yet danced by the finest "pisantry in the world," and nothing more exhilarating than its music can be heard.

Scotch jigs are mentioned by early English writers as well as by Burns, who, in his "Jolly Beggars," has:—

> Wi' hand on haunch, and upward e'e,
> He crooned his gamut, ane, twa, three,
> Then, in an Arioso key,
> The wee Apollo
> Set aff, wi' Allegretto glee,

The Reel and Strathspey, peculiar to the Highlands of Scotland, bear no resemblance to the dance of any country, and the music which accompanies those dances is equally special and peculiar.

"Tullochgorum" is as fair a specimen of a Reel tune as can be named. The Strathspey is of the same musical measure, but slower in movement. "Tam's Highland Fling" well represents the Strathspey tune. Its title is doubtless borrowed from the little town of that name in Invernesshire.

Notices of the old English and French dances are postponed to a future number. Space will admit but of a hasty glance at two dances of French origin.

The Bourrée, the measure of which has become familiar to modern ears by frequent performances on the violin and pianoforte of some of Bach's fine specimens, was invented at Auvergne, where it was yet danced in the middle of the eighteenth century. Rousseau describes the Rigadoon as a lively dance, the air of which is in double time, and generally divided into two repeats, phrased in four separate measures, and commencing by the last note of the second time. The inventor is supposed to have been a professor of dancing named M. Rigaud. There is a Rigadoon in Handel's first German Opera, "Almira," and many favourable examples of this dance-measure in Playford's "Dancing Master."

The Siciliana was an ancient dance of Sicily. The old composers have profusely adopted the measure in their vocal as well as in their instrumental compositions. "Let me wander not unseen" (Handel) is a Siciliana. The Canaries is supposed to be of English origin. A specimen is to be found among François Couperin's compositions for the clavecin. Purcell introduced into his Opera "Dioclesian, or the Prophetess" (1691), among many dances, the Canaries, scored for two violins, tenor, and bass. It is a gay, melodious dance, always in brisk movement, written in three quavers in a bar, the first quaver in each bar being dotted. Shakespeare alludes to this dance as well as to the dance called the Brawl, of which Stafford Smith gives two specimens in his "Musica Antiqua," one slow, "for old people;" another more rapid, for "young married people." It was a dance characteristic of contention. It is written sometimes Branles. During the reign of Louis XIV., who was considered to be the finest dancer in Europe, the most favourite amusement at his court was the performance of dramatic pieces called Ballets. Dialogue was occasionally admitted into them, but dancing, gesture, and music were their salient features. The renowned master, Jean-Baptiste Lully, became celebrated for his music composed for those entertainments. Lully not only contributed in many ways to the improvement of instrumental music (he was the inventor of the Overture), but, in his capacity as director of the king's band, he, like the immortal Æschylus and Sophocles, had the arduous task not only of teaching the performers to play and to sing, but to instruct the dancers.

THE GREAT COMPOSERS, SKETCHED BY THEMSELVES.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. IV.—BEETHOVEN.

It is unfortunate for such a purpose as mine that neither Herr von Köchel nor Dr. Ludwig Nöhl was able to include in his published collection of Beethoven's letters more than a very few written during the sunny time of the composer's youth. We have learned to associate Beethoven so closely and uninterruptedly with "storm and stress" that it is hard to believe there ever was for him a period when, to use a homely English saying, the Black Ox of Care had not trodden on his foot—a period when, as Carlyle puts it, "the sacred air-cities of hope had not shrunk into the mean clay hamlets of reality." Yet the master must have had an experience common to us all, and if no record of it from his own pen exists, one essential means of estimating his character on the best of evidence is lost. As it is, the letters open painfully. We take them up expecting to find at the outset a cheery Beethoven, setting forth on his career with prospects coloured by the roseate glow of youth. Instead thereof we hear a lad of seventeen talk of his declining health, complain of settled melancholy, and give reasons why he cannot repay certain borrowed monies. A grimly prophetic start truly! At once we are en rapport with the traditionary Beethoven, and know that the way along which we have to travel in his company will offer no relief from clouds and darkness.

Taking into consideration first the letters written between 1783 and 1815, two broad black lines are found running through them. The one signifies health trouble, the other money trouble. These were to Beethoven the "lines of fate"—the spectres that dogged his steps and never left him till he sank into his grave. Let us see how they arose, and mark the initial years of their victim's torment, taking the health trouble first. Beethoven seems always to have been sensitive as regards bodily ailments, if not absolutely inclined to hypochondriasis. We gather thus much from the letter referred to above, in which he addresses a Dr. Schade of Augsburg on the subject of his mother's death. The young musician, then seventeen years of age, having been summoned from Vienna to witness the last moments of his beloved parent, passed through Augsburg, and borrowed three carolins of the doctor for travelling expenses. In explaining why the money had not been repaid, we find him using such language as this: "I must tell you that from the time I left Augsburg my cheerfulness as well as my health began to decline; the nearer I came to my native city the more frequent were the letters from my father, urging me to travel with all possible speed, as my mother's health was in a most precarious condition. I therefore hurried forward as fast as I could, although myself far from well." Subsequently he adds: "I have passed very few pleasant hours since my arrival here, having during the whole time been suffering from asthma, which may, I fear, eventually turn to consumption; to this is added melancholy—almost as great an evil as my malady itself." It was of consumption that Beethoven's mother had died, and here we find the boy—for he was nothing more—morbidly anticipating a similar end, while actually suffering from symptoms which might have been caused by the influence of mental moods upon a sensitive nervous organisation. Consumption, as we all know, never laid its lank chill finger on the master, nor did it ever threaten him; but thirteen years later that happened which was almost worse than death. A letter written by Beethoven to his friend, Pastor Amenda, gives us the first intimation of the disease which barred against him the gates of the world of sound. He had long been aware of its insidious approaches, but had said nothing. Probably he had tried to keep the matter secret even from himself, shutting his eyes to it, and chasing away the horrible anticipations it must have excited. But the malady crept on, and at last Beethoven could no longer live without the sympathy of his kind. He felt, as we all feel under like conditions, a craving for human consolation. He must tell somebody; not however any of his friends in Vienna, the news would be sure to get abroad, and he shrank with infinite pain from such publicity. So the master unburdened himself to the worthy pastor in distant Courland, and here are his words, beginning with the pathetic cry, "How often I wish you were with me, for your Beethoven is very unhappy":—"You must know that one of my most precious faculties, that of hearing, is become very defective; even while you were still with me I felt indications of this, though I said nothing, but it is now much worse. Whether I shall ever be cured it remains yet to be seen: it is supposed to proceed from the state of my digestive organs, but I am almost entirely recovered in that respect. I hope indeed that my hearing may improve, but I scarcely think so, for attacks of this kind are the most incurable of all. How sad my life must now be!" Diverging at this point to speak of his improved pecuniary condition, he soon returns to the all-absorbing theme: "Oh, how happy should I now be had I my full sense of hearing! I would then hasten to you; but as it is I must withdraw from everything. My best years will thus pass away without effecting what my talents and powers might have enabled me to perform. How melancholy is the resignation in which I must take refuge! I had determined to rise superior to all this, but how is it possible? If in the course of six months my malady be pronounced incurable, then, Amenda, I shall appeal to you to leave all else and come to me, when I intend to travel (my affliction is less distressing when playing and composing, and most so in intercourse with others), and you must be my companion. . . . You will not, I know, refuse my petition; you will help your friend to bear his burden and his calamity. . . . I beg you will keep the fact of my deafness a profound secret, and not confide it to any human being. Write to me frequently; your letters, however short, console and cheer me, so I shall soon hope to hear from you." With the utterance of this great cry, de profundis, the master seems to have found natural relief. His affliction was no longer a dreadful secret, gnawing, like the fox of the Spartans, at the very springs of life, and we soon find him discovering it to another friend, Herr Wegeler, but with an equally strong injunction against publicity: "That malicious demon, bad health, has been a stumbling-block in my path; my hearing during the last three years has become gradually worse." He then goes on to speak of the various remedies tried by, amongst others, an army surgeon named Vering, and adds: "I certainly do feel better and stronger, but my ears are buzzing and ringing perpetually, day and night." He does not, however, feel very hopeful: "I can with truth say that my life is very wretched; for nearly two years past I have avoided all society, because I find it impossible to say to people, I am deaf. In any other profession this might be more tolerable, but in mine such a condition is truly frightful. . . . To give you some idea of my extraordinary deafness, I must tell you that in the theatre I am obliged to lean close up against the orchestra in order to understand the actors, and when a little way off I hear none of the high notes of instruments or singers. It is most astonishing that in conversation some people never seem to observe this; being subject to fits of absence they attribute it to that cause. I often can scarcely hear a person if speaking low; I can distinguish the tones but not the words, and yet I feel it intolerable if any one shouts to me. Heaven alone knows how it is to end. Vering declares that I shall certainly improve, even if I be not entirely restored. How often have I cursed my existence! Plutarch led me to resignation. I shall strive if possible to set Fate at defiance, although there must be moments in my life when I cannot fail to be the most unhappy of God's creatures. I entreat you to say nothing of my affliction to any one, not even to Lorchen. I confide the secret to you alone, and entreat you some day to correspond with Vering on the subject. If I continue in the same state I shall come to you in the ensuing spring, when you must engage a house for me somewhere in the country amid beautiful scenery, and I shall then become a rustic for a year, which may perhaps effect a change. Resignation! what a miserable refuge! and yet it is my sole remaining one." One hears in this letter the strong man's cry of despair. It is evident that Beethoven's consciousness advised him better than the doctors as to the issue of his malady. He knew that hope, though talked about at present, had fled, and that nothing remained for him but such resignation as Plutarch could counsel and his own firmness of soul conquer. But that was not much. The master, looking into the future, could see himself defiant of Fate, or perhaps even acquiescing in its stern decree with the wisdom of Seneca when he said, "That which is a necessity to him who struggles is little more than choice to him who is willing." But he could also see himself at times "the most miserable of God's creatures," with no support from philosophy, and no innate sustaining power under the load of affliction. As regards the nature of his mental suffering, take the picture drawn in the quotation just made. Beethoven is fast becoming the "lion" of Viennese art-circles. Men and women are eager for his notice. To converse with him is an honour. But when they speak, he turns upon them eyes full of an expression not understood, and his lips remain firmly closed. "How absent he is!" they whisper, and turn away. Absent! Ah, if it could be only known how keenly he is present, and how, made conscious anew of his great trial, he, like another Job, is cursing the day wherein he was born! Who can gauge the anguish of such a man in moments like these? It belongs to himself alone, "and a stranger meddleth not therewith."

A second and still more remarkable letter to the same friend (Wegeler) now invites notice. Five months elapsed between the two epistles, and in that time much had happened. Beethoven's deafness remained uncured, and the master cast about for new and strange remedies. "The ringing and buzzing in my ears," he wrote, "have certainly rather decreased, particularly in the left ear, in which the malady first commenced, but my hearing is not at all improved; in fact, I fear that it has become rather worse. . . . Vering will not allow plunge baths, but I am much dissatisfied with him; he is neither so attentive nor so indulgent as he ought to be to such a malady; if I did not go to him, which is no easy matter, I should never see him at all. What is your opinion of Schmidt (another army surgeon)? I am unwilling to make any change, but it seems to me that Vering is too much of a practitioner to acquire new ideas by reading. On this point Schmidt appears to be a very different man, and would probably be less negligent with regard to my case. I hear wonders of galvanism. What do you say to it? A physician told me that he knew a deaf and dumb child whose hearing was restored by it in Berlin, and likewise a man who had been deaf for seven years and recovered his hearing. I am told that your friend Schmidt is at this moment making experiments on the subject." In this extract we have the first signs of the fretfulness and suspicion with which Beethoven regarded all efforts to serve him when the expectations of his impatient spirit were not at once met. But the tone of the letter is more hopeful, buoyant, and manly than that of its predecessor, for the simple reason that the master had fallen in love. He made no secret of the fact to Wegeler: "I am now leading a somewhat more agreeable life, as of late I have been associating more with other people. You could scarcely believe what a sad and dreary life mine has been for the last two years; my defective hearing everywhere pursuing me like a spectre, making me fly from every one, and appear a misanthrope; and yet no one is in reality less so. The change has been wrought by a lovely, fascinating girl who loves me, and whom I love. I have once more had some blissful moments, and for the first time I feel that marriage could make me happy. Unluckily she is not of my rank in life, and, indeed, at this moment I could marry no one. I must first bestir myself actively in the world. Had it not been for my deafness, I would have travelled half round the globe ere now, and this I must still do. For me there is no pleasure so great as to promote and to pursue my art." Under the influence of his new passion—a vain dream as it proved—Beethoven rose superior to affliction, for

> "There is comfort in the strength of love;
> 'Twill make a thing endurable, which else
> Would overset the brain, or break the heart."

We see this in the tone in which he refers to his future career: "I feel that my youth is only now commencing. Have I not always been an infirm creature? For some time past my bodily health has been increasing, and it is the same with my mental powers. I feel, though I cannot explain, that I daily approach the object I have in view, in which alone can your Beethoven live. . . . Oh, it is so glorious to live one's life a thousand times over! I feel that I am no longer made for a quiet existence." The exaltation of love appears in every line of this, but it only made more acute the pain of reflecting upon what might have been but for his affliction. Then the master cried, like another Paul: "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Speaking of an invitation to revisit Bonn, he exclaims: "What would be my thoughts amid the glorious scenery of my fatherland?—thoughts alone of the happier future which would have been mine but for this affliction. Oh, I could span the world were I only free from this! . . . Were I only half cured of my malady, then I would come to you, and, as a more perfect and mature man, renew our old friendship. You should then see me as happy as I am ever destined to be here below. Not unhappy. No; that I could not endure. I will boldly meet my fate; never shall it succeed in crushing me." A little while longer and the clouds settled thicker and darker than ever above the unhappy composer's head. In the early part of 1802 he was taken ill, and after gaining much benefit from the treatment of Herr Schmidt—the surgeon already mentioned, to whom was dedicated the Trio, Op. 38—he removed to Heiligenstadt for country air. But nothing could cheer him in the absence of hope about his deafness. And there was no hope. Not a ray lightened the prospect of his future years. Was life worth having under the circumstances? Was it not better to shuffle off so heavy a mortal coil in hope that the burden of the Hereafter would be less, since it could not well be greater. Beethoven discussed the question with himself. Disappointment and Despair urged him one way, Art and Virtue prompted the other, and they conquered. But the struggle left the master a wreck, anticipating death as a release, and only anxious to set himself right with a world he had refused to take into his confidence. It was under these conditions that he wrote the famous letter to his brothers Carl and Johann, a letter to be opened when he had passed away, and therefore embodying, we may presume, his most genuine feeling. There is something inexpressibly pitiful in the cry with which it opens: "Oh, ye who think or declare me to be hostile, morose, and misanthropical, how unjust you are, and how little you know the secret cause of what appears to you! My heart and mind were ever from childhood prone to the most tender feelings of affection, and I was always disposed to accomplish something great. But you must remember that six years ago I was attacked by an incurable malady, aggravated by unskilful physicians, deluded from year to year, too, by the hope of relief, and at length forced to the conviction of a lasting affliction, the cure of which may go on for years, and perhaps after all prove impracticable." This was the revelation he had to make to the world—the great secret he so long kept locked within his breast, or only confided to two or three distant and faithful friends. The mere statement would surely have sufficed; but Beethoven went on to dwell with painful minuteness upon the miseries he suffered: "Alas! how could I proclaim the deficiency of a sense which ought to have been more perfect with me than with other men—a sense which I once possessed in the highest measure, to an extent, indeed, that few of my profession ever enjoyed. Alas! I cannot do this. Forgive me, therefore, when you see me withdraw from you with whom I would so gladly mingle. . . . Completely isolated, I only enter society when compelled to do so. I must live like an exile. In company I am assailed by the most painful apprehensions, through the risk of my position being exposed." In the country wretchedness still flowed from the same prolific source: "What humiliation when any one beside me heard a flute in the far distance and I heard nothing, or when others heard a shepherd singing and I heard nothing. Such things brought me to the verge of desperation, and well-nigh caused me to put an end to my life. Art! art alone deterred me. Ah, how could I possibly quit the world before bringing forth all that I felt it was my vocation to produce?" No; Beethoven, who had then begun the Eroica Symphony, remained faithful to his mission. He would "suffer and be strong," but ready for death in God's own time: "I joyfully hasten to meet Death. If he come before I have had the opportunity of developing all my artistic powers, then, notwithstanding my cruel fate, he will come too early for me, and I should wish for him at a more distant period; but even then I shall be content, for his advent will release me from a state of endless suffering. Come when he may, I shall meet him with courage." Meanwhile, the master invoked the aid of sublime Patience: "It is decreed that I must now choose Patience for my guide. This I have done. I hope the resolve will not fail me stedfastly to persevere till it may please the inexorable Fates to cut the thread of my life. Perhaps I may get better; perhaps not. I am prepared for both." On the outside of this affecting letter, and at a later date, when the prospect was blacker than ever, Beethoven added the words of an "exceeding great and bitter cry": "The fond hope I brought with me here (Heiligenstadt) of being to a certain degree cured, now utterly forsakes me. As autumn leaves fall and wither, so are my hopes blighted. Almost as I came I depart. Even the lofty courage that so animated me in the lovely days of summer is gone for ever. O Providence, grant me one day of pure felicity! How long have I been estranged from the gladness of true joy! When, O my God! when shall I again feel it in the temple of nature and of man? Never! Ah, that would be too hard!" The master now knew the worst. The inevitable had revealed itself in all its grim proportions, and thenceforth his letters contain but few and slight references to the cause of so much misery. Writing to the Baroness von Drossdick about 1809, he says: "I live in entire quiet and solitude, and even though occasional flashes of light arouse me still since you all left this, I feel a hopeless void which even my art, usually so faithful to me, has not yet triumphed over." To Wegeler he remarked later on: "For the last two years my secluded and quiet life has been at an end, and I have been forcibly drawn into the vortex of the world: though as yet I have attained no good result from this—nay, perhaps, rather the reverse. Still, I should not only be happy, but the happiest of men, if a demon had not taken up his abode in my ears. Had I not somewhere read that a man must not voluntarily put an end to his life while he can still perform even one good deed, I should long since have been no more, and by my own hand too. Ah, how fair is life! but for me it is ever poisoned." In the first letter to Bettina Brentano, the composer's life trouble is also more than once referred to: "I am a wretched creature," he writes, "and yet I complain of others. . . . . Hope sustains me, as she does half the world; through life she has been my constant companion, or what would have become of me?"

MUSIC AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

In the original design of the French Exhibition of 1867 music prominently figured, a series of performances on a varied scale having been contemplated. But little or nothing came of it. The Imperial Commission bit by bit abated their scheme, difficulties arose as to the apportionment of the funds accorded, and finally the mountain brought forth the smallest of mice. This precedent may have had some influence upon the present Commission. We cannot say. But anyhow they did nothing for the exposition of music as an art till a comparatively recent date. Then, however, as though bent upon retrieving the fiasco of 1867, the authorities set to work in good earnest by appointing a Commission des Auditions Musicales, having MM. de Chennevières and Ambroise Thomas as presidents, and including among its members MM. Jules Cohen, Deldevez, Délibes, Gounod, Guilmant, Halanzier, Massenet, Saint-Saëns, and Wekerlin. The general idea which these eminent gentlemen were desired to carry out aimed at the representation of music in all its elevated forms, but especially at the encouragement of living composers, without losing sight of great and accepted classical works. With this comprehensive direction, and an assurance that 250,000 francs had been set apart for the encouragement of French music, the Commissioners were dismissed to their task.

The first subsequent act was the appointment of six sub-committees: No. 1 being charged with the finances and general administration, No. 2 with the Sociétés libres Françaises and foreign music, No. 3 with organ music, No. 4 with chamber music, No. 5 with the Orphéon Societies, and No. 6 with popular and national music. Each of these made a statement in due course to the Commissioners, who embodied it in a general report to the Government. That report having been "seen and approved," and published to the world, is now authoritative. From it, therefore, subject of course to modification, we may obtain a clear idea as to the musical department of the Exhibition.

The Financial Committee decided as follows: first, to engage an orchestra of 350 executants—band 150, chorus 200; second, to give ten concerts of French music with orchestra alone, or voices and orchestra combined, in the Grande Salle des Fêtes of the Trocadero, setting apart for that purpose 181,000 francs; third, to spend 10,000 francs upon concerts of French chamber music, 30,000 francs upon the choral music of the Orphéon Societies, &c., 4,800 francs upon organ performances, and 3,000 francs upon popular and national music. These arrangements, with expenses incidental thereto, will absorb the quarter-million of francs put at the disposal of the Commission.

The second sub-committee, of which M. Gounod was honorary president, found some difficulty in dealing with the matter of foreign music. They started with the notion that grave inconvenience would arise from the employment of the Exhibition orchestra in the performance of such music, and concluded that the best plan was to invite foreign orchestras to attend, give them the free use of the Grand Salle, and leave them to make what they could out of the speculation. By this plan alien composers would be able to rehearse their works at home, and preserve for them an interesting and varied national character. The idea was, no doubt, an excellent one, but when the delegates from abroad met their French colleagues it soon appeared impracticable. No assurance could be given as to the co-operation of foreign orchestras, and rather than forego the plan of an international exposition of music the committee determined that the Exhibition orchestra should be placed at the disposal of foreign composers for a series of ten concerts, no nation to claim, in the first instance, more than one, or to be allowed more than three rehearsals, and all responsibility in connection therewith to rest upon the delegates of the nations concerned. This, however, was not to exclude other orchestras if any chose to attend, and the committee point with pleasure to the action already taken by the Viennese Philharmonic Society in view of a series of performances in the Grand Salle. It is perhaps a vain hope that the orchestra of the Crystal Palace may be sent over by the subscriptions of our musical public; but England ought at least to be represented at one of the ten concerts, and Messrs. Arthur Sullivan and Cunliffe Owen, our delegates, may depend upon it that so much, if not more, is expected.

The sub-committee for organ music, presided over by M. Guilmant, had a very brief report to make. They recommend a series of performances "semblables aux séances connues en Angleterre sous le nom de Recitals," the public to be admitted without payment.

The fourth sub-committee, having in charge the interests of chamber music, announce arrangements for sixteen concerts in one of the smaller halls of the building, seven places in the sixteen programmes being reserved for unpublished works, to be chosen by a jury of taste. These concerts will take place every Friday from June 7 to September 20.

Among the arrangements made by the fifth sub-committee is a grand festival and international competition of Orphéon and other choral societies, to be held on July 21 and two following days. A festival of fanfares and military music is also proposed for three days in the month of September.

The report of the sixth sub-committee states that Austria-Hungary, Russia, Sweden, and Norway are arranging to have their national music represented at the Exhibition. But nothing in this department has as yet been decided, owing to the difficulty of making the requisite preparations.

Such, in brief, is the plan upon which music will be represented at the new World's Fair; and few will dispute that it does honour to the spirit and artistic zeal of our neighbours. The result cannot be foretold, but we shall watch the matter closely and keep our readers well informed with regard to it.

EXPERIMENTS ON ANCIENT INSTRUMENTS.

By W. H. Stone.

There is something weirdly attractive in endeavouring to elicit from an old musical instrument its long silent and forgotten tones. Whatever opinions individual musicians may hold as to the "music of the future," it is undeniable that the music of the past, thus made present to us, carries with it a fascinating savour of antiquity. It is not unlike the abstracted forgetfulness of things around which is instinctively produced in the mind of a scholar by the realistic pictures of Gerôme or of Alma Tadema. Whether we see the gladiators "Morituri" saluting the bloated Cæsar, the matrons turning down their thumbs as death-warrant of the craven fighter, or the too lithe and pretty Tibicina, with double pipe in hands and capistrum round her rosy cheeks tripping in the wedding procession, we cannot but feel ourselves transported to the time when all these things were real and of everyday occurrence. To the mind of a musician "the sound of a voice that is still" for over three thousand years is perhaps even more full of association and ideality. An interesting study in this department has recently been added to our former stock by M. Victor Mahillon, the Conservator of the Museum attached to the Conservatoire of Music at Brussels, and by M. Gevært, its well-known Director. These gentlemen undertook to determine the tone and compass of one or two of the four ancient flutes preserved in the Museum at Naples. "In making a copy of a Pompeian flute," says the Pall Mall Gazette of March 18, "M. Mahillon had a great difficulty to contend with, as they were all unfortunately incomplete with regard to the reed." The flute, or rather reed-pipe, which he undertook to examine measures exactly twenty-one English inches, is entirely of ivory, the bore cylindrical throughout its length, and the ivory tube is covered with metallic rings of bronze and silver, which turn to the right and left, but are kept from moving up and down by a fixed ring below them holding them in their respective positions. By means of these turning sockets, which are each pierced with a side hole establishing connection with the corresponding hole in the ivory tube, the performer was able to exclude at will sounds he did not wish to employ.

"It is plain," says M. Mahillon, "from the shape, that the instrument was intended to contain a reed, but the question was, what sort of reed?" He was, however, acquainted with the Egyptian Arghoul flute, which is of cylindrical bore, pierced with lateral holes like the Pompeian. No doubt the latter is of Greek origin, though, like other Greek instruments, originally borrowed from Egypt.

M. Mahillon chose the reed of the Arghoul, which is of the "striking" or "beating" kind, and after one or two trials, succeeded in making the pipe speak as he desired. He chose the single instead of the double reed, like those of the oboe and bassoon, on account of the two latter being always connected with conical and not cylindrical tubes. Admitting that the chromatic scale was known to the ancients, and the division of the tube by thirteen rings being given, it was permissible to believe that the right reed was found if the thirteenth sound was the octave of the first. This being done, B on the second line of the bass clef was obtained as the grave or lowest note of the instrument; by opening successive lateral holes, the following sounds were produced: C sharp, D, E, F, F sharp, G, G sharp, A, B flat, B natural. The absence of the C and D sharp is accounted for by the fact that the second and fifth of the rings are not bored. The hole which on being opened gives B flat, is on the other side of the instrument, and is closed by the thumb of the left hand. When the ring which opens the A is turned round, it opens a lateral hole pierced in the tube a little above that which gives G sharp, and produces a second G sharp a little higher than the first.

Since the first experiment M. Mahillon has reconstructed the most perfect of the four flutes, again using the beating reed of the Arghoul, and has obtained the following sounds:—B, C, C sharp, D, D sharp, E, F, F sharp, G, G sharp, A, B flat, B natural, C, C sharp.

M. Mahillon has also made copies of the Roman trumpets in the Museum at Naples, and has found them to have the following compass, starting from G below the line in the treble clef, B, E, G, B flat, C, D, E, F sharp, G, the real effect being just a quarter of a note below that written.

It is curious to compare the description of the pipe here given with that of the Roman Tibia, of which Horace speaks. Referring to the good old times, he says:—

> Tibia non, ut nunc, Orichalco vincta, Tubæque
> Æmula, sed simplex, et parva, foramine pauco.

The words "orichalco vincta," usually supposed to indicate a combination of bronze with more precious metals, correspond well with the "metallic rings of bronze and silver" described above.

It will be remembered that Mr. W. Chappell brought a similar set of experiments before the notice of the scientific public at the Loan Exhibition at South Kensington in 1876, in conjunction with the writer. He experimented on some Egyptian pipes found in the tombs. "It was the custom," he says, "of the Egyptians in the early dynasties of the empire to leave a pipe in the tomb of a deceased person, and to lay by it a straw of barley, by which the player might make fresh reeds when he awoke." Copies of these pipes from the British Museum and that at Turin were fitted with reeds made from fresh green straw, cut at a knot, with a single beating vibrator cut from one side, just in the fashion that children still make them in the fields. One pipe has six notes in the major scale, another has a diatessaron with the semitone at the top, none of them possesses the whole octave. They evidently represent a far earlier condition of the musical scale than the Roman instrument. The writer has since found an interesting coincidence which throws considerable light on another Egyptian instrument preserved in the British Museum. It consists of a large bored flute with four finger holes, but no lateral embouchure for the lips. In consequence of this deficiency it had been considered by Dr. Birch, the learned Egyptologist, as probably a forgery. But Mr. Girdlestone, of the Charterhouse, brought to the writer from a trip on the Nile an exactly similar instrument, except that it possessed six finger holes. On examination, the top rim of the tube was found to be thinned to a feather edge; it was also found that a stream of air directed against this produced a perfectly appreciable note. It thus appears that the Nay, as it is called—still played on the banks of the Nile—is a lineal descendant of its older progenitor now in the British Museum, with the exception of the enlarged scale. On looking at the plaster mural pictures, also in the Museum, the oblique manner of holding the instrument so as to allow the stream of air to impinge on the sharpened upper margin is perfectly distinct.

When we find that so accomplished an author as Charles Lamb, in his "Chapter on Ears," tells us that although he often attempted to whistle "God save the King," he never arrived "within many quavers of it," and that sometimes on hearing music he contrived to guess at the "thorough-bass," we cease to wonder at the mistakes we meet with on musical matters in the works of other writers. But then we must remember that Charles Lamb did not occupy the position of musical critic, and the frank acknowledgment of his ignorance of the art therefore causes no surprise. But if persons undertake to write upon music with the ostensible purpose of instructing others, we reasonably imagine that they have some special qualification for the task. We have frequently quoted some of the peculiar criticisms which appear in the local newspapers; and now we have before us a colonial journal containing a notice upon the performance of the "Messiah," which is printed as a "leader." After stating that part of the success of the work was owing to the atmosphere being "peculiarly vibratory," a compliment is paid to the singers, who, being "ladies and gentlemen," are said not to "live fast and immoderately, as most artists do, to keep up the due tension of the vocal chords and pulmonary endurance." "Our amiable amateurs," says the critic, "sang free and easy," and produced their effects by "reaching within the precincts of the soul of every appreciative person present." The air "Comfort ye, my people," "was brought out in full body of note by a barefaced youth, who would have silenced his father had he been a musician." The choruses were "marvels of precision, comparable to circles interlacing, as the orbits of the heavenly bodies," and "the basses were as full and imposing as any lion of a John Bull can be expected to take in his basement stand, even in music." Only once "the organist failed to give the key-note of a chorus; but the gents soon got into tone." "Specially speaking," it is said, "Handel is immortal in his 'Hallelujah': on his finishing that he must have felt faint." We confess to a similar sensation upon finishing this notice upon it.

In a recent number of the Tonkunst, published at Königsberg, the following paragraph appears: "Reading in the London Musical World the advertisements of both the Royal Academy (of Music) and the London Academy, one cannot help discovering from their tenor how much better the former is situated in comparison; for while the latter seeks to make matters particularly easy to their pupils the former proceeds with great independence. This is owing to the 'immediate patronage of her most gracious majesty' the Queen and her family. But is it right that the heads of state should be drawn into school competition?" The writer of the article then goes on to say that "this speculative use made of the highest names" has its drawbacks; and points out (with reference to the probability of this "English peculiarity" being introduced into Germany) that "the names of those who are called upon to occupy the foremost position in the state should be more respected." Now it is very natural that the editor of a foreign journal, seeing two academies advertised side by side in an English newspaper, with a list of professors occupied in the educational department of each institution, should conclude that they were on an equality in position; and he might reasonably wonder that one only should be under Royal patronage. We hasten, therefore, to inform him that the Royal Academy of Music was formed in 1823, the King being one of its most earnest patrons; that in 1830 it was incorporated by Royal Charter as a national institution; that it has produced very many students who have achieved a world-wide reputation, and that the patronage of the reigning Royal family has been accorded to it from its foundation. The London Academy of Music, on the contrary, is the private speculation of an artist who has always been himself at the head of it, and who engages a staff of professors on his own responsibility. The author of the remarks we have quoted will see therefore that the Royal Academy of Music makes no "speculative use of the highest names," but merely announces the fact that it is a chartered institution, and publishes a list of those who have ever been its warmest supporters.

We have lately had occasion to comment upon the proceedings of a trial in which it was proved that plates with the name of Broadwood were manufactured for the purpose of "putting on old pianos," and that others which contained the words "Collard and Collard model" (with the word "model" in very small letters) were used by makers of pianofortes shaped like those of Messrs. Collard. A recent case, however, which was tried at the Manchester assizes, enables us to say a word in defence of a tradesman who was himself deceived as to the real value of an instrument. It appears that a solicitor owned a violoncello which he believed was a genuine Stradivarius, and that a well-known collector of musical instruments commissioned a dealer to buy it for a very large sum, which he did, obtaining a receipt from the possessor of the cello in which he spoke of it as a Stradivarius. Some time afterwards the collector had occasion to dispose of his instruments, and before the sale several experts pronounced that instead of being a Stradivarius the cello was by an inferior maker named Ruggerius. The dealer, who found his credit at stake, immediately entered an action against the solicitor; but as neither plaintiff nor defendant could be pronounced legally to blame, it was suggested that the matter should be settled by arbitration, which was accordingly done. Now it is obvious that, although the purchaser was deceived in this transaction, there was no dishonesty on the part of either the dealer or the owner of the instrument; and we cannot but think therefore that, as the value of a stringed instrument can only be determined by the opinion of competent judges, the mere unsupported word of a dealer should have but little weight. Had the "experts," for instance, tried this doubtful cello before instead of after its purchase by the collector, its worth would have been decided, the dealer and the solicitor would have been undeceived as to its origin, and the vexatious action would never have been brought.

Those composers who write especially to supply the wants of the day should take a lesson from the catalogues of the American publishers; for, if we may look upon the one now before us as a fair specimen—termed a "live list" of the works of those "most wide awake to the demands of the times"—it will be at once seen how much the effect, even of a catching title, may be heightened by a racy little description of the general character of the pieces. For example, "The Alpine Shepherd's Lament. An Arcadian Shepherd with his flock. Sweet music. We lament when it is over;" "Unique Galop. Brilliant Galop, with a strange, bad, bright face on the title;" "Diamond Eyes, Polka Redowa. The owner of the eyes in question will delight to dance to it;" "Musical Echoes, Mazurka. The Mazurka furnishes the romance to dance music, and this does it finely;" "Benedictus, Sacred Quartett, 'Blessed be the Lord,' &c., with fine music;" "Silver Moon Reverie. Very bright reverie, with arpeggios, tremolos, &c.;" "With Chime and Song, Concert Polonaise. A little of the Chimes, and a great deal of the bright Song." Then some of the headings of this catalogue of "new music" are also, we presume, "adapted to the demands of the times;" for "A Rich List" of pianoforte music and "Neat Pieces for Violin and Piano" would hardly perhaps appropriately describe the old-world compositions of those who worked for the art rather than the market. Attention must also be drawn to a remark upon one of the vocal pieces, "Take this letter to my Mother," which is termed, "One of the 'Mother' songs that always reach the heart," so that there is evidently a growing tendency to classify those effusions which especially illustrate the domestic affections.

CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.—ADELPHI THEATRE.

Herr Ignaz Brüll's Opera, "The Golden Cross," produced on Saturday the 2nd ult., achieved a success which has thoroughly endorsed the verdict pronounced upon it in Germany. The Overture was encored, most of the principal pieces were enthusiastically applauded, vocalists, composer, the author of the English adaptation (Mr. Jackson), and Mr. Carl Rosa were called upon the stage, and bouquets were thrown to the two ladies who contributed by their excellent singing to so triumphant a result. But in proof that we gauge these wild demonstrations of delight at their true value we may at once adduce the incontrovertible fact that the feeblest numbers in the whole work were those which were redemanded. No doubt Herr Brüll, like many clever men before him, has been placed in a false position by his critics. He has been termed the "German Auber," and has also been hailed as the worthy successor of Lortzing and Nicolai, praise which we should think could scarcely have been bestowed upon a composer so lacking originality, save by those who, heartily wearied of the pretentious modern German school, are glad to welcome any writer who will condescend to colour his libretto with simple, pleasing, and tuneful music. That Herr Brüll has done this we willingly admit; that there is a fluency in his writing, an occasional proof of his power of appropriate orchestration, and, especially in the finale to the first act, evidence of a knowledge of dramatic effect we also allow; but that those who know the light Operas of Auber, Nicolai, Flotow, or even Adolph Adam, will accept the "Golden Cross" at the German valuation we should be sorry to think and, in spite of its great success, by no means inclined to believe. The story is extremely simple. In a village about twenty-eight miles from Paris, a young peasant, who is about to be married, has been drawn for the conscription, and is on the point of going with the army of Napoleon to Russia, when his sister, declaring she will give the golden cross she wears to anybody who will take her brother's place and that she will bestow her hand upon him when he returns, a substitute is found, and the first act ends with the departure of the troops. In the second act the remnant of the army returns; Gontran, the bearer of the golden cross, having been wounded in the war has been nursed by Christina, who is perfectly ignorant that her patient is the unknown one to whom she has plighted her troth. On his recovery he makes himself known, but as he cannot produce the token, having, when believing himself dying on the field of battle, entrusted it to a comrade, it is not until the arrival of the old crippled Sergeant Bombardon, who possesses the cross, that matters are satisfactorily explained. The Overture but faintly shadows forth the quality of the music which follows; for, in addition to its triviality, the monotony induced by the rigid adherence to one key is positively wearisome. The first act contains some of the best numbers in the Opera. Passing over the somewhat trifling Chorus of Maidens, with the incidental solos, we may select for special notice a melodious Romance for Christina, "Still young;" the ensemble following the weak (but encored) tenor song, "What is life;" portions of the duet, "Halt! front!" for the Sergeant and Gontran, and the whole of the finale, which is not only the gem of the act, but of the whole Opera. In the second act a Romance, "Shall I, her simple heart compelling," for Gontran, is one of the most pleasing pieces, an unexpected change of key happily expressing the feeling of the words, and the entire song, indeed, being as fair a specimen as can be selected of the composer's style. The duet for Gontran and Christina, "Tell me, will our parting grieve thee," is somewhat too suggestive of Gounod to pass unnoticed; and Bombardon's song, "Three years have writ," although dramatic and well-written in parts, also calls up reminiscences which made us doubtful whether Brüll or Auber had the greater share in the composition. As we have already said, the reception of the opera was such as to lead us to believe that a great work had been placed before us; and if such enthusiasm can only be supported, Mr. Carl Rosa may well afford to pay but small attention to the critical few who, like ourselves, have but the interests of art to maintain. The general performance of the Opera was extremely good. Miss Julia Gaylord materially increased her reputation, both by her singing and acting, in the part of Christina; Miss Josephine Yorke, as Theresa, was all that could be desired; Mr. Maas displayed a good tenor voice as Gontran, although at present he has but few requisites for an actor; Mr. Aynsley Cook, as the bluff Sergeant Bombardon, over-acted and over-sang the character, as is usual with this clever but too demonstrative artist; and Mr. Snazelle, in the small part of Nicolas, gave his music with good taste and feeling. The work was well placed upon the stage, and the orchestra thoroughly efficient in every department. The début of Madlle. Fechter, daughter of the well-known actor, as Marguerite, in Gounod's "Faust," was more successful in a histrionic than a vocal sense. The charm of her acting in every phase of the character made itself so felt throughout the house that regret was universally expressed at the weakness of a vocal organ which had evidently been well trained, the high notes especially being exquisitely pure and sympathetic. In less exacting parts we have no doubt that Madlle. Fechter will yet win her way; but the real physical power absolutely demanded for Marguerite places it at present beyond her reach. Mention must be made of the excellent singing of Mr. Maas in the character of Faust, and the Mephistopheles of Mr. F. H. Celli must also be most warmly commended. "The Lily of Killarney," "The Bohemian Girl," and "The Flying Dutchman," have been included in the répertoire, and overflowing houses have rewarded the indefatigable and praiseworthy exertions of the lessee, whose excellent conducting contributes materially to the success of the performances.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

Dr. Crotch's Oratorio, "Palestine," revived by this Society in 1874, was repeated on the 1st ult. with a success which cannot but be regarded as a protest against the oft-repeated assertion that English music is but coldly accepted by English audiences. True it is that the applause was not such as we are accustomed to hear in the concert-room, but it must be remembered that many of the subscribers to this Society approve not the system of receiving sacred works with those audible demonstrations of delight which they would award to secular ones, and we judge therefore by those half-subdued expressions of gratification which the excessive beauty of the various pieces elicited from every attentive listener in the room. The name of Dr. Crotch is but little known to the rising generation, and it required therefore the presentation of a work of such unquestionable power as "Palestine" to prove that he was any more than Professor of Music in the University of Oxford, and an acknowledged authority on the theory of his art. Let us at once say that his style is doubtless based upon that of Handel, but that he is in the slightest degree an imitator we emphatically deny. As a rule his choruses are broad, massive, and worked throughout with the hand of a consummate master, some indeed being so perfect both in conception and treatment as to justify us in saying that they might have been written by his great predecessor; but in no place are we reminded that he has relied for effect on a copy, or even a paraphrase, of the thoughts of another. The instrumentation is extremely full, occasionally even redundant, considering the time at which the Oratorio was written; but generally the orchestral colouring, especially in the choral portions, is most appropriate, the instances being rare indeed where we could desire that the brass had been more sparingly used. Perhaps the most conventional portion of the work is the Overture, which, opening with a Larghetto in C minor, is followed by the traditional Fugue and a melodious Andantino (all in the same key), a bright episode in the tonic major, and a few concluding bars in the original key. Once firmly grasping the spirit of his text, however, the composer thinks only of its sympathetic expression; the opening Air and Chorus, "Reft of thy sons," being a truly eloquent setting of the mournful words, and affording a good proof of the earnestness with which the author entered upon his task. The Choruses—"Oh, happy once," with its fine contrapuntal effects and skilfully contrasted accompaniments; "Oh, feeble boast," in which the trumpets and horns are used with much judgment; "Hence all his might," a piece containing some of the boldest writing in the Oratorio; and "He comes," the jubilant character of which is most successfully sustained—may all be cited as examples of the composer's command of vocal and orchestral resources. Then for melodious beauty and broad dramatic effects the Choruses, "Let Sinai tell," "Then the harp awoke" (commencing with a bass solo), "Nor vain their hope," and "Be dark, thou sun," claim so high a rank, even as abstract choral pieces, that we cannot but marvel how they can have been suffered to fall almost into oblivion. The charming Quartett, "Lo, star-led chiefs," and the Quartett, with Chorus, "Then on your tops," have occasionally been heard apart from the Oratorio; but that the beautiful Quartett and Chorus, "Be peace on earth," and the Air, with Semi-chorus, "In frantic converse," with the deeply pathetic choral passages, "The voices of the dead," should not have engaged the attention of our Choral Societies seems almost inexplicable. The solos are, perhaps, as a rule scarcely equal to the choral pieces; but many of them are extremely melodious, "O Thou, their Guide," "E'en they who dragged," and "No more your thirsty rocks," for soprano, "Did Israel shrink?" and "Vengeance," for tenor, and "Ah! faithful now no more," for bass, being especially worthy of individual mention. The principal singers—Miss A. Williams, Miss Julia Elton, Miss Ellen Horne, Mr. Cummings, Mr. Santley, and Mr Maybrick—were thoroughly efficient, Miss Williams materially increasing her reputation by her excellent delivery of the trying soprano music, and Mr. Santley gaining an enthusiastic encore for his artistic rendering of the air, "Ah! faithful now no more." The orchestra, although occasionally too loud, especially in the more quiet concerted pieces, gave generally much effect to the rich instrumentation which pervades the work; and the choir afforded ample evidence of the careful training of Sir Michael Costa, who conducted the Oratorio as if it were a labour of love.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The second Concert of the season was given on the 28th of February, an interesting feature in the programme being Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale," a work reflecting the brightest and happiest days of the composer. The genial and melodious character of these movements, and the clearly defined purpose throughout the composition, make us wonder why the word "Symphony" should not have been applied to it, for assuredly it is as complete as many works which bear this more ambitious name. The Scherzo has a fascinating subject, with which the Trio, in the tonic major, forms a charming contrast; and the final movement, constructed on a somewhat novel model, and largely developed, forms a fitting termination to one of the most characteristic of the many works composed by Schumann during the most productive year of his too short career. The other orchestral works were Beethoven's Symphony in A (No. 7) and the Overtures to "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn) and "Guillaume Tell" (Rossini), in all of which the orchestra exhibited signs of improvement, although the want of delicacy is still apparent. In the rendering of Sterndale Bennett's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor Madame Arabella Goddard showed not only that her executive power is as perfect as ever, but that her appreciation of a composer whose works it has ever been her delight to interpret deepens with time. The Barcarole was a marvellous specimen of a chaste and refined style which, if we may judge from some recent performances, seems fast departing; and the last movement was given with an impetuosity and perfect command of the varied shades of tone which elicited a storm of applause as enthusiastic as it was well deserved. Madame Edith Wynne was the vocalist. At the third Concert, on the 14th ult., Herr Ignaz Brüll gave a brilliant and artistic rendering of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, Haydn's Symphony, Letter Q, and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony being also included in the programme. The vocalist was Mr. Santley. At both these concerts Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.

The first of the four subscription Concerts took place on the 26th of February, the programme being well selected for the display of the choir. Prominent amongst the sacred compositions given were Walliser's Motett "Gaudeat in Cœlis," which was excellently sung, and the Motett of Bach "The Spirit also helpeth us," the excessive difficulties of which, although still baffling the laudable attempts of the choir to secure a perfect rendering, were wonderfully well surmounted. Amongst the Madrigals and Part-songs we may especially mention "Oh, fading joy," by the late Mr. Charles Lucas, a very successful example of the modern Madrigal; two other works of the same class, "Fair Daffodils" (by Mr. Hubert H. Parry), and "If I had but two little wings" (by Mr. J. F. Barnett), which was redemanded, and "Cherry Ripe," skilfully arranged as a Part-song by Mr. Leslie, the above-mentioned pieces being performed for the first time. Miss Robertson, Miss F. Robertson, and Mr. Forington were the solo vocalists, the first-named artist eliciting the warmest demonstrations of approbation, especially for her facile rendering of Persiani's variations on Paesiello's air "Nel cor più." Mdlle. Debillemont played three pianoforte solos with but small effect amongst the musical portion of the audience.

MADAME VIARD-LOUIS'S CONCERTS.

The second of these Orchestral Concerts was given on the afternoon of the 5th ult., the choice of pieces and their generally excellent rendering justifying a larger attendance than was assembled on the occasion. A novelty in the programme was a Minuet and Trio by Mr. Ebenezer Prout, the melodiousness of which, apart from its masterly instrumentation, ensured its cordial reception. The spirit of the old dance has been happily caught, and the Trio forms an effective contrast, a brief coda giving a satisfactory conclusion to the composition, which, it should be mentioned, is intended to be complete in itself. M. Bizet's Suite, "L'Arlesienne," containing a Prelude, Minuet, Adagietto, and Carillon, is a work of the highest interest, the Minuet especially being full of beauty, and the Adagietto charming so much by the grace and refinement of its themes and the skill of its orchestration, as to elicit an enthusiastic encore. Again the band, under the direction of Mr. Weist Hill, gained the highest honours by an interpretation of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony and Sterndale Bennett's Overture "The Naiades" such as is rarely heard; and the warm applause after each of these works proved how thoroughly the audience appreciated a performance so absolutely perfect in its minutest details. Madame Viard-Louis's choice of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat for her principal solo gave ample evidence that she has full reliance upon her executive powers, which, indeed, were thoroughly equal to the occasion; but it must also be said that in the slow movement she displayed a true and legitimate power of expression. She also played with good effect Mendelssohn's "Variations Sérieuses." The vocalist was Mr. E. Lloyd, who was highly successful in Weber's Scena, "Oh, 'tis a glorious sight," and Mendelssohn's Song, "The Garland."

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

Besides the four evening performances of last month, we have still to notice the concluding concert of the previous month, which took place on February 25, and on which occasion Herr Ignaz Brüll was again the pianist. In his rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 29), the able Viennese artist again proved himself a refined and brilliant exponent of classical music, without, however, possessing a very marked individuality of style. His playing pleases, and occasionally surprises, by the easy triumph over difficulties, but it does not materially advance our insight into the poetic signification of the works interpreted. This was the twelfth performance at these concerts of the Sonata in question, and old frequenters of the institution are apt to draw comparisons, scarcely perhaps always fair to the latest comer. Herr Brüll was, however, greatly applauded, and an encore having been insisted upon, he gave a very spirited reading of Weber's Momento capriccioso. Herr Joachim delighted the audience by the masterly execution of the adagio from the twenty-second Concerto by the violin composer par excellence, Viotti, being supported on the pianoforte by the accompanist, also par excellence, Sir

Julius Benedict. The chamber-music consisted of Beethoven's String-Quartett in F minor (Op. 95), and Schumann's Trio in F major for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. Signor Piatti having been called to Italy, in consequence of a family bereavement, his place was taken by Herr Daubert. Mr. Santley contributed to the evening's enjoyment by his rendering of a song by Sullivan, and of Handel's "O ruddier than the cherry," producing, as usual, a not altogether legitimate effect by the introduction of the high G in the concluding bar of the latter air.

The programme of the first concert of last month (March 4) comprised Beethoven's Quartett in C major (Op. 59) and Haydn's Quartett in C major (Op. 74), the executants being MM. Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, and Daubert. The instrumental solo performances on this occasion were divided between Mdlle. Marie Krebs and Herr Joachim, the former playing with her usual grace and refinement Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, while the great violinist gave, for the first time at these concerts, the Romance from his own Hungarian Concerto, which was extremely well received. Herr Joachim is not only a consummate master of his instrument, he also knows how to write for it, and this characteristic movement from the Concerto in question furnishes in itself a marked proof of his great general ability as a musician. Herr Henschel's splendidly sonorous baritone voice and artistic interpretation met with the full appreciation of the audience, the vocal pieces selected being two airs from Handel's operas, and three German Lieder. Sir Julius Benedict was again the Conductor.

On the second Monday of the month the concert opened with Mozart's exquisite Quintett in G minor, the sixth, in chronological order, of the nine works of a similar kind among the published compositions of that master, but the first, unquestionably, in point of excellence. Any one entertaining a doubt as to the true meaning of the word "classical" as applied to music should hear this beautiful work, which, indeed, contains the explanation in its every movement, viz., an abundance of creative ideas harmoniously developed and matured, and the parts placed into such exquisite symmetry that the altering of a single note would disturb the general plan of architecture. The Quintett was finely played by MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, Zerbini, and Pezze. Haydn's Quartett in G minor (Op. 74) was the second of the two chamber-works usually included in the programme of these concerts. Mdlle. Marie Krebs was the able exponent of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor for Pianoforte alone, the same accomplished artist having also participated with Herr Joachim in a capital performance of Beethoven's Sonata in G major (Op. 30). Mdlle. Redeker and Herr Henschel, two special favourites at the Popular Concerts, were the recipients of much well-deserved applause in Handel's but rarely heard duet "Che vai pensando," and two-part songs by Schumann, Brahms, and Henschel respectively. An encore accorded to the latter was readily responded to by the two sympathetic singers giving an additional vocal duo, to which Herr Henschel played the accompaniment. Mr. Zerbini was, as usual, a very efficient Conductor.

The third evening of the past month introduced for the first time during this season, the stalwart Berlin pianist, Herr Barth, to the audience, whom he fairly astonished by the extraordinary feat of memory involved in the performance, without the printed music, of Brahms's most difficult variations on a theme by Handel, twenty-five in number. Such mental efforts are, indeed, not now altogether uncommon among executive artists, but they never fail, as yet, to act as a surprise when exhibited. Apart from this striking proof of the possession of a capacity which, to our thinking, is really outside the specific value of an artistic performance, Herr Barth delivered himself of his arduous task with great intelligence and taste, his phrasing being particularly distinct and his style free from mannerism. Thoroughly artistic also was the pianist's accompaniment of Herr Joachim's splendid rendering of three charmingly poetic Romances by Schumann. Mdlle. Redeker, who was again the vocalist, sang with fine expression vocal pieces by Brahms and Schubert. The two by the latter composer, "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" and "Dithyrambe," are but rarely heard, and to judge from the character of the poetry to which they are joined (Schiller's), appear to have been the result of an experiment rather than of spontaneous selection on the part of the great lyrical composer. The concert, which opened with Haydn's Quartett in B flat (Op. 61), concluded with Schubert's Ottett, the great beauties of which being now so universally recognised, it is superfluous for us to add more than the fact that the work was capitally played by MM. Joachim, Ries, Zerbini, Lazarus, Wendtland, Wotton, Reynolds, and Piatti. The latter gentleman, who had returned to his accustomed post on this occasion, was greeted on first entering with unmistakable signs of the great esteem in which he is so deservedly held by the musical public. Sir Julius Benedict officiated as Conductor.

The last concert of the month (25th ult.) included Brahms's Quartett in B flat (Op. 67) and Beethoven's Trio in G major (Op. 9), the executants being MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, and Piatti in the former, and the first and two last-mentioned artists in the latter. Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who was the pianist, gave an admirable reading of the "Humoreske" (Op. 20), by Schumann, being also associated with Herr Joachim in the execution of Schubert's characteristic "Rondeau Brillant" for pianoforte and violin. Madame von Asten, who made her first appearance at the Monday Concerts on this occasion, sung with pleasing effect songs by Schubert, Taubert, and Rousseau, accompanied with his usual efficiency by Mr. Zerbini.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The Saturday Concerts of the past month have fully maintained their character, both as regards the variety and interest of their programmes. On the 2nd ult. the special novelty was Goldmark's Symphony "The Country Wedding," which was performed for the first time in this country. Regarded merely from a musical point of view, and looking at its contents rather than at its form, there is much to interest and attract in Goldmark's work: there is decided inventive power and much clever workmanship; but, in spite of its title, we cannot consider the piece in any sense a Symphony. It is rather an orchestral suite in five movements. It opens with a Wedding March, followed by thirteen variations, in many of which great ingenuity is displayed. The second movement is a Bridal Song (allegretto); the third a Serenade; the fourth is entitled "Im Garten;" and the finale is a Dance. The work was excellently played and warmly received. The Overtures at this concert were both familiar—Beethoven's "Coriolan" and Mendelssohn's "Hebrides." Herr Joachim was the instrumentalist, and played in his finest style Spohr's "Scena Cantante" and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor. Handel's Largo, arranged for solo violin, harp, organ, and orchestra by Hellmesberger—a most un-Handelian though we admit effective transcription—was repeated at this concert, it having been performed last season with great success. The vocalists were Miss Merivale and Mr. Edward Lloyd.

A magnificent rendering of Beethoven's Symphony in A was given at the following concert (the 9th ult.). The Ballet music from Verdi's "Don Carlos"—omitted when the work was performed on the stage—was given for the first time in England. It can hardly be said that the music was worthy of a Saturday concert. Dr. Sullivan's clever and brilliant overture to "The Sapphire Necklace" was the opening piece of the programme. Miss Marie Krebs was the pianist on this afternoon, and played Chopin's Concerto in F minor with her usual beautifully finished technique and intelligent style. The vocalists at this concert were Madame Sophie Löwe and Signor Foli. The lady deserves particular commendation for her selection of pieces: avoiding the stereotyped numbers which seem to constitute the whole repertory of some singers who might be named, Miss Löwe brought forward an interesting Scena, "Ingeborg's Klage," from Max Bruch's "Frithjof," and two songs by Robert Franz.

Professor Macfarren's "Lady of the Lake" occupied the whole of the concert on the 16th ult. The work was composed for the opening of the new Music Hall in Glasgow, which took place last November; and the present was, we believe, its first performance since that occasion. The libretto of the Cantata, which has been prepared by Mrs. Macfarren, follows Scott's poem pretty closely, though it has of course been necessary both to omit and to condense much in order to bring the work within reasonable length. The music is characterised by the same features of interest which have attracted the attention of musicians to Dr. Macfarren's Oratorios. We find here the same high artistic finish, the same power of appropriate expression, which are to be noticed in "St. John the Baptist" and "Joseph." Much of the music in the present Cantata is highly dramatic in thought and feeling, as, for instance, the Quartett (No. 10), in which Roderick Dhu asks for the hand of Ellen, or the whole scene between Roderick and Fitz-James in the second part. In these it is hardly necessary to say the composer has been highly successful, while he has been no less happy in many of the lyrical portions. Among these may be named Ellen's Song, "Ave Maria," in which Dr. Macfarren was forced to provoke a comparison with no less a composer than Schubert. Here he has skilfully avoided the difficulty by writing very appropriate music in which the keenest hunter after reminiscences will fail to find the slightest resemblance. The beautiful "Lay of the Imprisoned Huntsman," near the close of the work, is another most excellent number; while the Part-song, "Not faster yonder rowers' might," and the Boat-song, "Hail to the chief who in triumph advances," should be specified as admirable imitations of the style of Scotch national melody. The work, as a whole, will rank among its composer's best; but it needs a far more adequate performance than it received at the Palace to bring out all its beauties. Of the soloists who appeared in it, Madame Patey alone did full justice to her music: all the other principals, whom we refrain from naming, were more or less unequal to their work; while neither band nor chorus were satisfactory: the former were probably over-fatigued with a long rehearsal in the morning, while the latter were both coarse and imperfect in their execution.

Rubinstein's fifth Concerto (in E flat), played by Mr. Oscar Beringer, was the novelty on the 23rd. We heard the work at the Philharmonic concerts about two years since, played by the composer. The impression produced by it on that occasion was by no means favourable; and after hearing it a second time, we sincerely hope we shall never be called upon to listen to a third performance. The music is not only very dry, but in parts positively ugly. Rubinstein seems to have taken the first ideas that came into his head, and to have treated them (as the Americans would say) "permiscous," and the result is a composition the effect of which is at times absolutely unpleasant. It is only due to Mr. Beringer to say that he played the enormously difficult pianoforte part magnificently; but we could not help regretting that he wasted his great talents in practising such music. The orchestral pieces on this afternoon were the Overtures to "Melusine" and "Der Freischütz" (both splendidly played), the variations from Beethoven's fifth Quartett, given (according to a most reprehensible custom) by all the strings, and Haydn's charming Symphony in G, known as "Letter V." The soloists were Mrs. Mudie-Bolingbroke and Mr. Santley.

ROYAL AQUARIUM CHORAL SOCIETY.

This recently formed Choral Society gave its first Concert on Ash Wednesday the 6th ult., Sir W. S. Bennett's "May Queen" being the work selected for performance. The choir numbers about 120 voices, and every member has been subjected to careful examination before admission. The result, as might be anticipated, is thoroughly satisfactory. The Choruses in the "May Queen" were sung with remarkable precision and firmness of attack; the gradations of light and shade were carefully observed, and the body of tone was effective, considering the disadvantageous position in which the choir was placed, and the fact that they were singing behind a band of 100 performers. The soloists were Miss José Sherrington, Miss H. D'Alton; Messrs. Shakespeare and Thurley Beale, all of whom sang with their customary success. On Saturday the 23rd ult. the choir gave a second Concert, and sang, under the direction of their Honorary Choirmaster, a charming Serenade by Alfred Cellier, "Wake then, O darling," a German Volkslied, and a very effective Part-song by Mr. Eaton Faning, "The Vikings." The voices were a little out of time in the first verse of the Volkslied, but "The Vikings" was especially well rendered. The audience, which was very large, appeared to thoroughly enjoy the Concert. The position of the orchestra at the Royal Aquarium is acoustically perhaps the worst in London; but we believe the directors have under consideration a scheme for building a concert-room at the west-end of the Aquarium, and until this is done anything like a satisfactory musical performance is out of the question. Mr. J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," and Mr. F. H. Cowen's "Rose Maiden," are now in rehearsal, and will be performed soon after Easter. We are informed that there are a few vacancies in each department of the choir.

MR. KUHE'S BRIGHTON FESTIVAL.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

The second week of this prolonged series of concerts began February 25, with a performance of miscellaneous music, the leading features in which were the Overture to "Tannhaüser," an Entr'acte from Mr. F. H. Cowen's "Maid of Orleans," conducted by the composer; Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, played by Mr. Kuhe; and Haydn's Symphony in D, eleventh of the Salomon set. On the following evening music of a more uniformly high order was provided, including Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony and Organ Sonata in B flat, followed by Verdi's "Requiem," with Mrs. Osgood, Miss Anna Williams, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and Signor Campobello as leading vocalists. The performance of each number presented satisfactory features, but over all we pass to arrive at the chief novelty of the Festival—Mr. F. H. Cowen's Oratorio "The Deluge." This work, as some may remember, was expected one year, nay two years, ago, but circumstances on neither occasion admitted its completion in time. We are quite willing to believe that nothing has been lost by delay. Oratorios, save when a Handel is the producer, do not reach healthy life without much trouble in the conception and bringing forth, and for the time spent by Mr. Cowen in perfecting his work it is certain that an ample return will be forthcoming. Its subject naturally suggests many and great difficulties, above all if treated from a dramatic point of view. The event around which all must turn is so tremendous, and the attendant circumstances so unparalleled, that only a colossal genius, to which both ideas and their adequate expression come intuitively, could hope to grapple with them. Mr. Cowen, we are glad to say, attempted nothing of the sort. The book of his Oratorio has little or no dramatic character, being limited to narration and didactic comment. Yet even so treated the subject taxed the composer heavily, and we must be excused if, after looking at the words and before hearing the music, we felt strong misgivings about the result. The libretto, taken for what it is, does not demand lengthened remarks. It follows the Mosaic story with closeness, using always the words of the Bible, and between every two incidents or steps in the progress of the narrative it interpolates more or less appropriate Scriptural texts. Exception might no doubt be taken to the relevancy of here and there a quotation, but generally speaking the book is well put together, and enabled Mr. Cowen to start with a manifest advantage in hand.

At present there is no Overture to "The Deluge," and we believe the composer has not determined whether to write one, properly so called, or to substitute an elaborate and descriptive orchestral number for the choral music in which the actual catastrophe is now treated. The question deserves serious consideration, but we are correct in saying that an Overture or its equivalent will ultimately form part of the work. In default the Oratorio opens with a so-called Choral, "He that formeth the mountains." Having little in common with the measured phrases of the Choral proper this number is yet distinguished by a gravity and dignity becoming its name. Its progressions are often bold and striking, while the loftiness of its style serves at once the purpose of an exordium by arresting attention. At its close a tenor Recitative, "The Lord looked down from heaven" (freely accompanied by the orchestra), leads to a Chorus, "They are all gone aside, and there is none that doeth good." The first section of this number opens fugally, and may be objected to as hardly in keeping with the serious nature of the text. But amend is made in the second section, "Their wickedness is great, and the thoughts of their hearts are evil." Here the music not only accords with its theme, but is effective per se, and keeps up to the lofty standard set by the introduction. A contralto Air, "It repented the Lord that He had made man," comes next, accompanied by an expressive "figure," assigned in the first instance to violins con sordini, and rarely ceasing to be heard from some part or other of the orchestra. Otherwise the air is not remarkable, nor, save for its smooth and easy flow, can we greatly commend the bass Song, put into the mouth of Noah, "I delight to do Thy will, O my God." Both, though well made, want that distinctiveness of character for the absence of which no perfection of workmanship can atone. Interest, however, is renewed by the next number, a Duet, "Like as a father pitieth his children," for soprano and tenor. The voices are treated with considerable independence of each other, and the general effect, aided by an attractive use of the orchestra, is pleasing. This number may always be reckoned upon to secure public favour. We now approach the catastrophe, which is heralded by a contralto Recitative, "And it came to pass at the appointed time." In its treatment Mr. Cowen ventures near the dramatic form. He makes us hear the cry of the drowning world, "Out of the deep we cry unto Thee," three times repeated, each utterance being followed by a short Recitative showing how the pitiless waters rose till "all the mountains under heaven were covered," the whole ending with a fiercely triumphant and much elaborated Chorus, "Thine enemies shall perish, O Lord." Our opinion upon this mode of treatment is decided. We hold it to be either not enough or too much. It is not enough for an adequate illustration of the awful event which forms the subject and raison d'être of the Oratorio; while an illustration not being intended, it is too much. In either case the result is disappointment. We counsel Mr. Cowen to reconsider this part of the work. The Gladstonian "three courses" are open before him. First, he may expand his present matter till it acquires dimensions and importance worthy of the central incident of the story; or, next, he may simply recite the Biblical words under conditions of studied solemnity, leaving imagination to do the rest; or he may call upon his orchestra, unaided by words, to suggest the catastrophe. One or other of these courses it is desirable he should adopt before next the Oratorio is heard. There are some good and effective points in the jubilant Chorus before adverted to, and this number, in any case, would be retained, as it is a logical if somewhat unpleasant comment upon the wholesale destruction just before achieved. At its close occurs an unaccompanied Trio for soprano, tenor, and bass, "God is a stronghold in the day of trouble." Here Mr. Cowen is once more pleasing and effective beyond common. The music is throughout expressive, well written for the voices, and admirably relieved by organ interludes which give an appropriate colour to the whole. In the following soprano Recitative, "And God remembered Noah," large descriptive use is made of the orchestra, especially with reference to the wind that passed over the earth. But much higher skill appears in the next number, an Air for contralto, with incidental Choruses, "What is man that Thou art mindful of him?" Few more impressive things than this occur in modern Oratorios, the plan of the number being in several respects original, while large, independent, and characteristic use is made of solo, chorus, and orchestra, with a view to the maximum of effect. The prominence given to two trumpets may be mentioned as quite distinctive, and the manner of their employment is in a high degree striking. Another Recitative, "And the ark rested," introduces a tenor Air, "Behold, the earth is void," which makes no concession to popular taste, the composer seeming to have realised the desolate grandeur of the picture, and to have sought only its highest expression. Between this and the next Air (soprano), "The rain is over and gone," there is a contrast not less wide than grateful. In the one case we have set before us desolation and death, in the other we see returning fruitfulness and life. Charmingly does the composer show us the latter. He reveals skies clear and serene, the trees are putting forth their leaves, the birds are singing, and Nature everywhere rehabilitates herself. We estimate this song very highly. It reflects, without exaggerating, the spirit of the scene described, and bursts upon us in the Oratorio like a ray of sunlight across a stormy sky. After another Recitative, "He stayed yet seven days," we have a Chorus, "Behold, the day," of considerable importance both as to character and dimensions. It opens with a prolonged crescendo on the words, "The sun ariseth and the morning is come," followed by an attractive episode for female voices, "Go ye forth in joy and peace," with harp accompaniment. Finally, occurs an ensemble to the ancient benediction, "The Lord bless thee and keep thee," &c. Here, also, harps are prominently used, and give distinctive colour to very effective music. A Quartett, "Come let us bow down and worship," next claims attention, especially with regard to the use made of the orchestra; the long melody for violins in octaves, coming after the voices have ceased, being almost a movement in itself. This however is only one of several features in the work which show independent thought and corresponding boldness of action. We now have a final Recitative, "And God said, I will not again curse the ground," and a final Chorus, "The sun shall no more go down," wherein Mr. Cowen emulates all of grandeur that has gone before, and gives us ample reason to say Finis coronat opus. And now as regards the Oratorio generally, we must express an opinion that it is not only by far the best work Mr. Cowen has yet produced, but a credit to English art. Upon details we may have, after further acquaintance, to modify present views, but it will surprise us indeed if our conviction that "The Deluge" shows loftiness of purpose carried out in a striking and effective manner has ever to be changed. The performance, conducted by the composer, was not perfect, nor were the means at disposal quite adequate to the desired end. But the solos were well sung by Mrs. Osgood, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Thurley Beale; while the band did as much justice to the elaborate accompaniments as, all things considered, could have been expected. The reception of the work was most favourable, and two numbers—the unaccompanied Trio, and the Air, "The rain is over and gone"—had to be repeated.

At the same Concert was given Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," with the Rev. J. Troutbeck's translation of the original words, as published in Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co.'s edition, and performed for the first time at the Leeds Festival of last year. What an effect was made by such noble music, heard perhaps for the first time in Brighton, in connection with the ideas that inspired it, we need not stop to tell. The soloists were those who took part in "The Deluge;" and the performance as a whole gave much satisfaction.

A Concert of popular songs and instrumental pieces took place on the following evening, for the benefit of Mr. Kuhe, Mr. Sims Reeves being among the soloists engaged; and on Saturday, the 2nd ult., the Festival ended with the "Messiah," the sacred Oratorio attracting, as usual, a very large audience. It is understood that the series of performances proved successful from a business point of view, and of this we are glad. But we shall be still more pleased when Mr. Kuhe can combine a like result with a general programme somewhat higher in the average worth of its selections.

HANDEL'S "BELSHAZZAR" AT MANCHESTER.

The performance of Handel's fine but neglected Oratorio, "Belshazzar," on the 28th of February, proved one of the most noticeable features of Mr. Charles Hallé's present series of concerts. That a work so thoroughly characteristic of the genius of its composer, and so dramatic as almost to insure its acceptance with a mixed audience, should be comparatively unknown, can only, we think, be accounted for by its excessive length, which positively necessitates "cuts," and by the fact of its being so unfamiliar to the majority even of Handelian choirs that the work of preparation is more than many Conductors will care to undertake. In the present instance, however, both these obstacles were overcome; for the excisions were in every case made with much judgment, and the laborious rehearsals were conducted with so much zeal both by Mr. Hallé and the indefatigable Chorus-master, Mr. Edward Hecht, that the result was a triumph of which all concerned have a right to be proud. So much has been said lately about "additional accompaniments" to Handel's Oratorios, that in furnishing supplementary instrumental parts to "Belshazzar" Mr. Hecht may perhaps have been ruled as much by his modesty as by his reverence for the composer in exercising a reticence which we should like to find universally followed. Certain, however, it is that his "additional accompaniments," which were used in the performance under notice, materially aided the effect of the score, and in the chorus of Babylonians in the second part, threw a rich glow of colour over the scene of revelry: indeed, so thoroughly did this grand choral piece move the audience that it was enthusiastically re-demanded. As a rule the choruses were magnificently sung, especially "See from his post Euphrates flies," "All empires upon God depend," the devotional chorus of the Jews, "Sing, O ye heavens," and the number already named "Ye tutelar gods," with the following "Sesach, this night is chiefly thine." In all these the skilful organ accompaniment written for the work by Professor Macfarren came out with fine effect, carefully and unobtrusively played as it was by Mr. Walker. The principal vocalists were Madame Nouver, Madame Patey, Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Herr Henschel. It should be mentioned that the recitatives were accompanied on the pianoforte, an acceptable innovation at least upon the traditional scrapes on the violoncello. The orchestra was perfect in every department, the Overture and the symphony descriptive of the defeat of Belshazzar being very finely rendered. We sincerely hope that the great success of this work will induce Mr. Hallé to revive some others of the many lesser known Oratorios of Handel.

The prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera announces that the season will commence on the 2nd inst. Madame Adelina Patti, Mdlle. Albani, Mdlle. Zaré Thalberg, Mdlle. Bianchi, Madame Scalchi, and Mdlle. D'Angeri, are included amongst the favourite vocalists engaged; and three new lady singers are advertised, Mdlle. Dotti, Mdlle. De Riti, and Mdlle. Emma Sarda. Signori Nicolini, Gayarre, Carpi, Pavani, and M. Capoul are in the list of tenors, and Signor Bolis (who has not sung in this company for two years) will also make his appearance. The only new comers amongst the baritones are Signori Melchi and Carbone, the names of all those whose fame is already secured being retained. The novelties are "an entirely new" Opera by M. De Flotow entitled "Alma" ("L' Incantatrice"), the late Georges Bizet's "Carmen," the principle rôle by Madame Adelina Patti, and Victor Massé's "Paulo e Virginia," the chief character in which will be sustained by Mdlle. Albani; but as it is mentioned, in the usual phraseology of the lessee, that "two at least" of these will be produced, we are left in doubt as to the works which circumstances may render it desirable to select, especially as Hérold's "Pré aux Clercs" is named as another Opera under consideration. The personnel of the "unrivalled orchestra" as well as that of the chorus (which we may presume is thought to be capable of improvement) will, it is said, remain nearly the same as last season; and the conductorship will be divided, as usual, between Signori Vianesi and Bevignani.——Her Majesty's Opera is advertised to open on the 20th inst., but the prospectus was not issued at the time of our going to press.

The third subscription Concert of the Borough of Hackney Choral Association, which took place on the 4th ult., was, both for the quality of the music selected and the perfect manner in which it was performed, the most remarkable yet given by a Society the steady purpose of which is evidently to lead its supporters gradually to an appreciation of and love for the highest works in art. We have no hesitation in saying that so good a rendering of Beethoven's Mass in C has rarely, if ever, been heard, even with far more pretentious means at command. The choir evidenced not only firmness and precision, but a command of the gradations of tone which made every movement tell with marked effect upon an audience remarkably sympathetic, considering how unfamiliar the music must have been to the majority. The principal singers were Mrs. Osgood, Mdlle. Hélène Arnim, Messrs. J. Harper Kearton, and C. E. Tinney. Mendelssohn's "Loreley" music was no less excellently interpreted, Mrs. Osgood eliciting well-deserved applause in the soprano part, and the choir achieving new triumphs in the exquisite "Ave Maria" and the "Vintagers' Chorus." The quality of the orchestra was most successfully tested in Haydn's "Military" Symphony, the reception of which will no doubt lead to the performance of other orchestral works of importance at future Concerts. Mr. Ebenezer Prout, through whose zealous exertions the Society has advanced to its present excellence, conducted throughout with his accustomed care and judgment.

A selection of sacred music was given in the Trinity Wesleyan Church, Hornsey, on the 4th ult., under the direction of Mr. H. G. Froome. The choir, numbering between fifty and sixty voices, acquitted itself throughout in a highly satisfactory manner, the Choruses "And the glory of the Lord" and "For unto us" ("Messiah") and "Let their celestial concerts" ("Samson") being excellently rendered. The soloists were Mrs. Broad, Mrs. Bagster, Miss A. F. Bilby, Miss M. Pearson, Miss Woodfin, Mr. W. Rendell, and Mr. Walter Reeves, all of whom were very successful; Miss A. F. Bilby in "He was despised" and "O rest in the Lord," Mr. Walter Reeves in "Rolling in foaming billows," Mr. Rendell in "If with all your hearts," and Mr. Froome in the Recitatives "And God said" and "Straight opening" and Air "Now heaven in fullest glory," being much and deservedly applauded. The performance was brought to a close with the Hallelujah Chorus, which was given with fine effect. Mr. Joseph Jones was an efficient accompanist, and Mr. James Broad shared with Mr. Froome the post of Conductor. The proceeds are to be applied towards the reduction of expenses incurred by recent improvements in the church.

The prospectus of the Bach Choir for the present season announces three Concerts at St. James's Hall, the first of which will take place on the 6th inst. The works to be given during the series are the "Christmas Oratorio" (first three parts), the Magnificat (first time in London), and the Mass in B minor of Bach; the "New Year's Song" (first performance in London) of Schumann; the Anthem in six parts, "O God, Thou hast cast us out," of Purcell; the Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei from the "Missa Papæ Marcelli" of Palestrina; the "Walpurgisnacht" (in German) and 114th Psalm of Mendelssohn; the "Shicksalslied" (in German) of Brahms; the Anthem (principally for double choir), "O Lord, Thou art my God" of S. S. Wesley; and the Madrigal "Draw on, sweet night," of Wilbye. The vocalists engaged are Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Mdlle. Redeker, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Shakespeare, and Herr Henschel. Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, who has so materially contributed to the success of this choir, retains his post of Conductor, and Herr Straus is the principal solo violinist.

An excellent Concert (the last of a series of four) was given on Thursday the 7th ult. at Eldon School, Wandsworth Road, under the direction of Mr. Frederick St. John, in aid of the Choir Fund, St. Ann's, South Lambeth. The Choir gave a very good rendering of Gounod's "Send out Thy light," "To Thee, great Lord" (Rossini), and "Evening Hymn at Sea" (R. A. Smith). The solo vocalists were Miss Clara Hodgson, Mrs. Powell, Miss E. Broad, Messrs. H. Gordon, A. Weston, C. Powell, N. Green, J. W. Ellison, and F. St. John. Solo pianoforte, Mr. W. A. Ellis. Mr. W. A. Ellis (Organist of the church) played with much effect Chopin's Andante Spianato, and Polonaise in E flat, and had to respond to an enthusiastic encore. The vicar, the Rev. W. A. Harrison, proposed a vote of thanks to the artists who had assisted, and especially to Mr. St. John for his energy in promoting and carrying out the series of concerts. The accompanists were Mr. E. Winter White and Mr. James Halle.

It is now definitely arranged that the Norwich Musical Festival will begin on the 15th October, and extend over the three following days. The vocalists engaged are Mdlle. Albani, Madame Trebelli-Bettini, Miss A. Williams, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Messrs. Lloyd, Shakespeare, Santley, and Hilton. The opening Concert will take place on Tuesday evening, when "Acis and Galatea" and "Spring," from Haydn's "Seasons," will be given. Wednesday morning will be devoted to the performance of "Elijah;" Thursday morning to Dr. Macfarren's new Oratorio, "Joseph," and Mozart's Mass, No. 1; and Friday morning to the "Messiah." On Wednesday and Thursday evenings there will be miscellaneous concerts. The Conductor will be, as usual, Sir Julius Benedict. A new orchestra has been erected in St. Andrew's Hall, and the rehearsals of the principal choral music have already commenced.

A capital performance of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" was given by the Grosvenor Choral Society on February 27. The solo parts were taken by Miss Palmer (who replaced Miss M. Roby, absent through indisposition), Mrs. A. Dye, Mr. A. Lawrence Fryer, and Mr. H. Baker, all of whom sang the music allotted to them with care and effect. The choruses were rendered with excellent precision and much spirit, and the general execution of the work reflected much credit on the Conductor, Mr. J. G. Callcott. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous, the principal item being Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, which was given in a manner that elicited loud applause. A concertina and piano Duet, the Trio, "This magic-wove scarf," and "The Reapers' Chorus and Country Dance," by the Conductor, were all well received, as were indeed nearly all the pieces in the programme. Mr. S. Dean Grimson led the band, and Miss Marie Odell was an efficient pianist.

The prospectus of the Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society announces that three Oratorio Concerts will be given during the present season, under the conductorship of Mr. R. Taylor, the works selected being Handel's "Israel in Egypt," Spohr's "Last Judgment," and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and Costa's "Eli." It is a great feature in this Association that the services of the Conductor, Organist, and other officers being rendered gratuitously, subscribers' tickets for the series of concerts are issued at so low a rate as to place them within the means of all music-lovers; and the growing importance of the Society may be estimated by the fact of the railway company having made special arrangements for the performances, the first of which will be on the morning of the 6th inst.

The St. George's Glee Union gave its usual monthly concert, at the Pimlico Rooms, on Friday the 1st ult., the choir being heard to much advantage in the part-music, two pieces having to be repeated. Miss Coyte Turner received well-earned applause for her artistic rendering of Sullivan's "Chorister" and "The Storm" (Hullah); Miss Bessie Spear was highly effective in "O bid your faithful Ariel fly" (Linley), and "O'er the meadows" (Boyton Smith); and Mr. R. F. Roberts was very successful in "Neptune" (Diehl), and "The Scout" (F. Campana). Mr. Kinkee accompanied with much skill, and Messrs. Garside and Monday conducted.

We are glad to find that Mr. Harry Wall, as Secretary of the "Copyright and Performing Right Protection Society," announces that "if any programme containing the names of the compositions proposed to be produced at any public entertainment (of which the place and date must be stated) be submitted to the office, he will be happy, with the view of preventing any penalties for infringement or piracy being incurred, to immediately furnish all the information required in connection therewith, which may be within the province or knowledge of the same." This is of course all that was ever required of him; but why was this important intimation not given at first?

Mr. William Henry Aylward, whose death is announced in the obituary of our present number, was a violoncellist of great merit, and possessed a large amount of traditional knowledge both as an orchestral and quartett player. At an early age he became a student of the Royal Academy of Music, and subsequently a professor of the Institution. He was also a member of the Philharmonic and Royal Italian Opera bands, appointments he was obliged some time since to relinquish on account of ill-health. His loss will be greatly regretted; for not only did his talent gain him much esteem, but he was valued as a warm and sincere friend by all who knew him.

The fourth Annual Concert of Mr. T. Loder Childerstone took place at Ladbroke Hall, Notting Hill, on Monday evening, the 4th ult., when a capital programme was performed by Miss Kate Hardy, Miss Ellen Lamb, Madame Belval, Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant, Mr. Stedman, Mr. Lucas Williams, Mr. Arthur Jarratt, and Mr. T. Loder Childerstone. The playing of Mdlle. Vaillant was much admired. Among the most noticeable of the vocal pieces were "Awake, sweet warbling bird" (T. Avant), Miss Ellen Lamb; "A Sea Song" (Humphrey J. Stark), Mr. Stedman; and "The Mountain Maid" (Sinclair), Miss Kate Hardy.

The performance of Mr. E. H. Turpin's Cantata, "A Song of Faith," and Madame Sainton Dolby's "Legend of Saint Dorothea" by the Brixton Choral Society on February 25 deserves especial mention as one of the best yet given by this enterprising Association. In the absence of an orchestra, the accompaniments were well rendered by Mr. Boardman (organ) and Mr. Turpin (pianoforte); but Mr. W. Lemare (who is one of the most zealous Conductors we know) is behind his age in not securing a small band when he attempts works which depend for much of their effect upon instrumental colouring.

A Concert was given at the new Town Hall, Kilburn, on the 4th ult., for the benefit of the proprietor, which attracted a large audience. The programme was of a popular character, the principal vocalists—Madame Patey, Miss Saidie Singleton, Miss L. Romer, Mr. W. Wallace, Mr. Warner, Mr. Tucker, Signor Adelmann, and Signor Rocca—giving several well-known vocal pieces with much effect; Madame Patey and Miss Saidie Singleton (who is rapidly gaining a foremost place as a concert-singer) being especially well received. The instrumentalists were Mr. W. Beavan (harmonium) and Mr. J. Beavan (pianoforte).

A private performance of Mendelssohn's Operetta, "Son and Stranger," is to be given on Saturday evening, the 6th inst., for a charitable purpose, when the following artists have very kindly given their services: Miss Leonora Braham (Lisbeth), Miss Amy Gill (Ursula), Mr. Stedman (Herrmann), and Mr. Wadmore (Kauz). The acting part will be represented by amateurs, and there will be a small chorus; the accompaniment and incidental music being played on the pianoforte and harmonium by Mr. W. H. Thomas, Mr. Oliver King, and Mr. H. M. Higgs.

The excellent Chamber Concerts of Herr Franke, given at the Royal Academy of Music, terminated on the 19th ult., the audience displaying by frequent applause how thoroughly the exceptionally good programme provided on the occasion was appreciated. Throughout this, the fifth, series of Herr Franke's meetings, a high tone has been the rule in the selection of works; and we are glad to find that the attendance has been gradually increasing in numbers.

An Evening Concert was given on the 8th ult. at the Athenæum, Camden Road, by the committee of that Institution. The artists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Kate Hardy, Miss Jenny Pratt, Mr. Raynham, Mr. Maybrick, and Mr. W. H. Eayres, solo violin. The programme was most attractive, and the concert highly successful. Mr. Wilfred Bendall was the accompanist.

Rossini's widow, who died during the past month at Passy, near Paris, aged seventy-eight, has left the fortune bequeathed to her by her husband (subject to small legacies to relations) to found a Charity for superannuated singers.

REVIEWS.

Aus der Tonwelt. Essays von Louis Ehlert. [Berlin: B. Behr'sche Buchhandlung.]

These essays originally appeared at different periods in German periodicals; and if, as he seems to imply in his preface, their author really entertained any doubt as to the appropriateness of their republication in a collective form, we can only congratulate the numerous readers which this volume is sure to find that his scruples have been overcome. Since the appearance of W. H. Riehl's brilliant musico-historical sketches entitled "Musikalische Charakterköpfe," of whose style, indeed, we are occasionally reminded in the pages before us, nothing so delightful has issued from the German press in a similar field of literature. Varied as the subjects are with which he deals, and by no means equal as to their respective merits of treatment, Herr Ehlert proves himself throughout a thorough musician who places the true interests of his art above every other consideration, and whose strongly marked individuality and great general culture enable him to present to the reader various phases of modern artistic life in a manner at once brilliant and instructive. Originality and independence of thought, founded upon a comprehensive knowledge of the subject-matter and represented in a graceful and characteristic style, are qualities not too frequently to be met with in these days of book-manufacture and journalistic enterprise, when, especially in matters musical, every one appears to consider himself called upon to write. It is all the more refreshing, therefore, to meet with an author of Herr Ehlert's stamp, who possesses the above qualifications in a high degree.

Of the fourteen essays which this volume comprises, by far the greater portion is intended for the general reader, treating of individual composers and their works, while but a few appeal more particularly to the specialist, partaking more or less of a purely critical or polemical character. In the former category we prefer the author's representation of those artists with whom he has been in personal contact. The article headed "Carl Tausig" is a noble in memoriam sketch of the altogether abnormal career of the great pianist. Striking and highly suggestive also are the chapters dealing with "F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy" and "Robert Schumann und seine Schule." A fine dialectical effort in the sphere of polemics, though perhaps the least interesting to English readers, is Herr Ehlert's vindication of the raison d'être of purely instrumental music against the onslaughts in this direction made in a moment of ex cathedrâ vanity by the great historian and Shakespearian scholar, Herr Gervinus, in his book entitled "Händel und Shakespeare." Some exquisite poetic touches occasionally add not a little to the general artistic warmth of these literary sketches. Thus, in his essay on "Offenbach and the Second Empire" (we quote in translation), the author expresses his opinion that the demoralising effect of the introduction into Germany of the Offenbach operetta is after all but an ephemeral one, and adds, "The good German burgher would fain have a glimpse at Parisian orgies, at least from a distance. . . . Let him, however, return from the modern Babel to his homely fireside; though he may for a short while seem dissatisfied with his surroundings, and present a nightworn and confused appearance, the first loving glance from the eyes of his little child will bring him back to his normal condition." As a matter of course, the later works of Herr Richard Wagner occupy not a little space in the contents of this volume. We become acquainted with Herr Ehlert's views in two articles, written at different periods, on "Tristan und Isolde," as well as in one entitled "A Scene in Die Meistersinger" and another on the "Bühnenfestspiel in Bayreuth," and his remarks on these, the most recent manifestations of the genius of the German reformer of Opera, contain some of the most striking among the ideas in which these essays abound. Herr Ehlert is by no means a confessed disciple of "the master," yet it is curious to notice the fascinating influence which, in spite of himself, the hearing of the works in question exercises over his reasoning faculties. This momentary surrender of preconceived ideals, in which so many musical minds of even an ultra-classical type have had to participate while under the immediate impression of Herr Wagner's music, is aptly illustrated in the following words. Referring to a representation at Berlin of "Tristan und Isolde," Herr Ehlert remarks: "When in the second act Isolde is awaiting her lover; when the whole orchestra is throbbing as though with a thousand pulses, and every love-nerve is converted into its equivalent musical sound: then I am no longer the man that I am during the rest of the year, an artistically and morally definable subject—I am a Wagnerian. There are in life so many changes; we change our domestic abode, the town, the country. A similar interruption of my every-day art-consciousness is to me 'Tristan und Isolde.' Hearing it, I am prepared to change not only the domestic abode, but town and country too, of my artistic creed. In 'Tristan' all our previous art-conceptions are being huddled up together, it administers such a violent shock to whatever of self-sufficiency and critical arrogance, of supposed maturity and imagined infallibility, has been accumulating in us, that every honest thinker can only profit by the study of this work." An instance also of the growing effects of Herr Wagner's music upon the individual is furnished in Herr Ehlert's article on the "Bühnenfestspiel in Bayreuth," originally published in the Deutsche Rundschau, and in which the now famous Tetralogy meets, on the whole, with an adverse criticism. In comparing the original publication with the article as it now stands we find, however, that the author has made some significant alterations in modification of his censure. He has, moreover, added a concluding paragraph, in which he says: "I have within the short space of a few days (since the Bayreuth performances) experienced how the musical ideas underlying Wagner's work will take root in the mind and grow. The painfully fatiguing effects which accompanied the performances, the prejudicial impression even which the incongruous elements in the work could not fail to produce, are gradually vanishing before the peculiar grandeur of their proportions."

In conclusion, we recommend to all those among our readers who possess a sufficient knowledge of German not to defer reading Herr Ehlert's essays until they may have been translated into English. The style in which they are written reflects so faithfully the marked individuality of the writer, that even in the hands of the ablest translator much of their peculiar charm must inevitably be lost. And here we relinquish an altogether pleasant task, satisfied that, without further recommendation on our part, these highly interesting sketches by an earnest artist will find their way into every musical circle where their exceptional merit is likely to meet with an intelligent appreciation.

Rapsodies Norvégienne for Orchestra. No. 1 in B minor (Op. 17), No. 2 in A (Op. 19), No. 3 in C (Op. 21). By Johan S. Svendsen. [Christiania: Carl Warmuth.]

Whenever a composer comes to us with a work avowedly based upon national music we give him a hearty welcome, for that which he brings is sure to be interesting, and a resort to the primitive sources of art is a step that should for many reasons be encouraged. How important has been and is the influence of national music upon classic works few require to be told. The greatest composers in all ages have gone to the people for materials with which to work, and in the "profuse strains of unpremeditated art" which gush forth there as naturally as wild flowers spring up on a moorland they have found many of their most striking melodic types and rhythmical forms. We have cause, therefore, to be interested in these Norwegian Rhapsodies before looking at a page—the more cause since Scandinavian music has a special right to sympathy from a people who can look back to a time when the "dark and true and tender" North was their home. Mr. Svendsen has the reputation, based on what little music by him is known in England, of being a disciple of the "advanced" school, and it may therefore be supposed that his Rhapsodies are wild and formless concoctions—national music driven mad by "higher development." But they are nothing of the kind. Each has "a beginning, a middle, and an end," that is to say, a decided and well-balanced form, while the composer's treatment of the themes, though sufficiently imaginative and picturesque, never stoops to exaggeration nor approaches caricature. On this account the three works claim to be recognised as legitimate additions to an interesting category, and Mr. Svendsen is a candidate for enrolment among the masters who have treated national music on true artistic principles. No. 1 differs from its companions in having a short Andantino introduction, but otherwise they are identical in plan, beginning with an Allegro, having a slow middle movement, and ending with another Allegro, which, by reproducing some of its predecessor's features, rounds off the whole secundum artem. In another respect they agree—namely, as to the manner in which one or two melodies are used as the basis of each movement, and presented over and over again under the varied aspects secured by ingenious orchestral combinations. Little or no "development," in the ordinary acceptation of the term, is attempted; the composer choosing to leave the simple melody supreme, and confining himself within the limits just described. Upon the manner in which he has discharged his task we are bound to compliment him. The orchestration is everywhere piquant and charming; while the treatment of the melodies, without lacking plenty of musicianship, rarely fails to be in harmony with their character. As to the melodies themselves, those who know the "native wood-notes wild" of Scandinavia, with their strange mixture of joy and sadness, need not to be told how fresh and attractive they are. Passing over the details of each work, only to be made intelligible by copious use of music-type, we will content ourselves by assuring orchestral Conductors who desire new music adapted to interest learned and unlearned alike that in these Rhapsodies they may find it.

The Scientific Basis of Music. By W. H. Stone, M.A., M.B., Oxon., &c.

To seize the spirit of this useful treatise we should, as the author indicates, accustom ourselves to look upon any musical instrument as a scientific apparatus. Setting aside for a moment its legitimate purpose, it is well to think of the instrument as a means of demonstrating modes of vibration or wave-motion.

Beginning, as he tells us, with the measured beat of the pendulum, vibration is traceable in the most complex phenomena of heat and light. Its operation, however, can be made more obvious in a coarser medium like water, and to a less degree in the atmosphere. The effects of those atmospheric vibrations on our organs of hearing we call sound. In spite of popular scientific works and "Music Primers," it is not every one yet who habitually thinks of light and sound as only relatively existent and dependent on the sensibility of specific nerves in the eye or the ear.

What Dr. Stone refers to as the "great modern generalisation of vibration" was foreshadowed a century and a quarter ago by Dr. Robert Smith in the preface to his "Harmonics." He said, "Almost all sorts of substances are perpetually subject to very minute vibrating motions, and all our senses and faculties seem chiefly to depend upon such motions excited in the proper organs either by outward objects or the power of the will."

"Modern generalisations" have only confirmed, and have not exceeded, what Dr. Smith so plainly predicted in the words we have placed in italics. In reading treatises on the scientific basis of music we cannot therefore too clearly understand that the basis assumed is purely a question of sensation; that is to say, in the first instance of the crude, rudimentary effects of atmospheric vibrations. Dr. Stone is of opinion that the vibration theory "will one day with certainty embrace the marvellous manifestations of electricity." Very likely; and it will probably get beyond even that. Meantime we have to make certain arbitrary distinctions between the sensation excited by the "outward object" and our perception of the sound as affected by the mind or the will. For example, the brilliancy of the prismatic colours and their complementaries, being a question of vibration and ratio, completely illustrates the effect of pure and agreeable sensation, just as a chord in music will when mathematically correct. But the artist generally rejects brilliant colours; and it is not because they are brilliant or agreeable as separate sensations, but because his first care is what he calls the "general tone" of his picture—that is, the co-ordination of the whole to some central point of attraction; and if necessary he will sacrifice scientific detail to that end.

Considering then the "scientific basis of music" to be primarily a question of sensation, we will religiously follow Dr. Stone within those limits, and we wish for no better guide.

We are at once reminded by the author of the difficulty of conceiving the form and mode of propagation of an aerial vibration. "A bell," he says, "when rung in open air or deep in still water, throws off spherical shells of alternate condensation and rarefaction, expanding equally and simultaneously in all directions until they meet with an obstacle." Supposing the atmosphere, we might say, to be the clear deep water, those of us standing in any direction in the neighbourhood of the bell would be enveloped in a tremor or fog visible only to the ear, the words visible and audible being merely linguistic expressions to convey the result of more or less the same process as affecting different organs. Hence when by a figure of speech we speak of the direction of a ray of light or of a radius of sound from its source to the corresponding organ of sight or hearing, we illustrate our meaning in both cases by straight lines when the media are homogeneous, although, as Dr. Stone says, "the wave of sound emitted by a sonorous body is ill represented by the ordinary conception of a straight line."

He explains to us that the sound-wave does not involve the transmission of a material substance; "it is not like the flight of a cannon-ball from point to point; it does not move as a whole. Each particular atmospheric molecule moves only an infinitely small distance." We are to understand that when the "particular molecule" has given its nudge to its neighbour it returns—as exemplifying what we call the elasticity of the air or whatever the medium is—to its original place. The succession of nudges causes that "thrill" we perceive even by another sense, the touch, and call "vibration." The extent to which the vibrating particle moves out of its original place to nudge its neighbour is called the amplitude of the vibration, and determines the loudness of the sound. The rapidity or velocity with which it moves determines the pitch of the sound.

Dr. Stone quotes from Dr. Haughton's "Natural Philosophy" an amusing and familiar illustration of the production of a musical note by regular and periodic vibrations at a certain velocity. Their regularity or periodicity distinguish them from vibrations which are unmusical or which create mere noise. "The granite paving-stones of London are four inches in width, and cabs driving over the pavement at eight miles an hour cause a succession of noises at the rate of thirty-five in the second which correspond to a well-known musical note, and one that has been recognised in the silence of the night by many competent observers. Nothing can be imagined more purely a noise, or less musical, than the jolt of the rim of a cab-wheel against a projecting stone; yet, if a regular succession of such jolts takes place, the result is a soft, deep, musical note that will bear comparison with notes derived from more sentimental sources."

The quality of the sound depends on the shape of the wave, which may be a simple curve, like that given by a stroke of the pendulum, or a compound of several simple curves. The varieties of amplitude and velocity—that is to say, the different intensities and differences in pitch of those constituent simple vibrations in the compound wave—determine the peculiarities in quality of tone between one voice and another or one instrument and another.

It is that part of the question relating to partial tones or "harmonics," together with the effects of third sounds, "difference tones," and summational tones, produced by the conflict of the vibrations of two sounds, which form the newest and the most interesting part of the "Scientific Basis of Music," as far as musical people are concerned. Under the heads of "Musical Tone," "Harmonics," "Consonance," "Quality," "Concord and Discord," and "Resultant Tones," those two parts of the subject are treated clearly and, we may add, completely for all ordinary purposes in the Music Primer we are reviewing. When the latest acoustical facts and theories are thus picked out and, from a musical point of view, presented in so convenient a form to the amateur or musician, there can be no excuse for any further absolute ignorance on such topics. Without some knowledge of these questions, a great deal of the music literature of the day is unintelligible, as must be a great deal of the common conversation in the more cultivated musical circles. An advantage in Dr. Stone's Manual is that it gives the scientific matter in the proper shape of a compact digest of the best authorities on the specific points treated, whether they be questions of acoustics or of different kinds of temperament, of scale or of keyboard; and he refers his readers to the responsible authorities, whether those authorities be Helmholtz, or Mr. Ellis, Mr. Bosanquet, Mr. Curwen, or Mr. Colin Brown. As in all the Primers we have seen of the same series, there is a laudable effort on the part of the author to sink his individual opinion. The rule, however good in principle, need not be followed too implicitly. Indeed, one of the best chapters in the present book consists of a reprint of an article on just intonation in the orchestra, written by the author in a now defunct journal, Concordia. When we once pass the pure scientific basis, when we get beyond, let us say, "summational tones," and follow the Primer into questions of scale and temperament, we are on the dubious border-land between music and science. Dr. Stone gathers together from several and original sources the explanations as well as the graphic illustrations of finger-boards adapted for playing in more or less just intonation on keyed instruments. The illustrations represent those invented by Colonel Perronet Thompson, Mr. Poole, Mr. Bosanquet, and Mr. Colin Brown. As they all slightly differ, and only very slightly, in regard to their mathematical principles, the question becomes which of the six systems alluded to in the text is the least inconvenient for practical purposes. That matter must be left to individual appreciation.

We cannot attempt to point out a tithe of the information contained in this Primer on the specially scientific questions, such as, for instance, the "sources of sound" in pipe, string, membrane, &c. That particular subject is exceedingly well treated; and on some of those points Dr. Stone is himself a practical experimenter and an authority. Apart from its merits we strongly recommend the book to musicians, as well as amateurs who do not wish to horrify Dr. Macfarren by taking up music merely as an "amusement;" or to remain apart from the musical world, as they assuredly will in these days, if they cannot at least understand the elementary questions of the scientific basis of the art.

Mass (Regina Cœli) in D major. By Thomas Wingham (Op. 14). [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

It is some recommendation for this work that on its title-page we read, "Composed expressly for, and first performed at, Antwerp Cathedral, August 15, 1876." We know at once that it has passed successfully through an ordeal not lightly applied, and that it has received the approval of competent musical authority. Mr. Wingham may consider himself fortunate in being able to send forth his Mass under such circumstances; but we are more disposed to felicitate him upon the manner in which, having an opportunity that falls to few, he discharged the task of its composition. Young men are fond—and the instinct is, on the whole, healthy and natural—of striking out new paths; wherefore, had Mr. Wingham sought at any cost to be startlingly original he would have given no cause for surprise. But he restrained himself within the bounds of classic precedent, and hence we have before us a work strictly orthodox alike in outline and detail—one which almost ostentatiously declares itself inspired by the masters of art. As, however, there are masters and masters, Mr. Wingham had to make a choice of schools. He might, for example, have followed in the wake of M. Gounod with his sensuous effects, or emulated the free and passionate outpourings of modern Italians. But he did wisely to reject these in favour of the style of Haydn and Mozart, with certain modifications to suit the graver taste of our day. In choosing this he not only secured the well-accustomed English ear, but also opportunities of exhibiting the solid musicianship which previous works had shown him to possess. His musicianship, however, is somewhat too exclusively exhibited in the "Kyrie," the contrapuntal treatment of which, though clever, is dry, and takes from the opening prayer the deep sentiment it ought always to possess. But no analogous criticism can be passed upon the first portion of the "Gloria," which breathes the frank and joyous spirit, relieved by the occasional tenderness and grace, of Haydn. The "Qui tollis" touches a chord of deeper tone, and is altogether a worthy and interesting feature of the Mass. At the "Tu quoniam" Mr Wingham returns to the music of the opening "Gloria," by way of preparation for an animated fugue, "In gloria Dei patris." The fugue, though not elaborated at great length, is well wrought, and does credit to its composer's contrapuntal studies. We may hint nevertheless that it exhibits rather too great a fondness for the cheap device of sequence—one which should be used with all the more care because so easily abused. The opening movement of the "Credo," a smooth piece of work, calls for no particular observation; but the "Et incarnatus" is worthy of notice as what it should be—a striking and impressive episode. The entrance of the unison voices on the word "Crucifixus," and against repeated diminished seventh chords in the orchestra, is happily managed with a view to the desired effect; but, indeed, the entire movement speaks well for Mr. Wingham's skill and illustrative power. The "Credo" ends, according to classic precedent, with a fugue, "Et vitam venturi," which, like its predecessor, is not extended, but supplies a good example of clear and fluent contrapuntal writing. Adopting a plan for which there are few, if any, precedents, Mr. Wingham employs in his Offertory three solo violins only (adagio). Whether anything save novelty is gained by this as against a movement for full orchestra is open to question; nor is the movement of such a character as to incline us in the composer's favour. It is a plain straightforward piece of work enough, without any specially interesting features. There are good points in the six-part "Sanctus," more especially in the treatment of the words, "Pleni sunt cœli," which is bold and striking; while the "Benedictus" has precisely the needed spirit of entreaty and restful hope. In the first part of this movement Mr Wingham follows a plan Schubert loved to adopt, by giving the solo voices in succession the same extended theme. Subsequently the chorus joins the soli, and the movement receives considerable expansion, retaining its interest to the end. The "Hosanna" is curious as being constructed, with the exception of a few opening and closing bars, upon a dominant pedal bass, above which a short movement in fugal style disports itself. Finally, the "Agnus Dei," copying illustrious models, reverts to the music of the "Kyrie," and a brief alla breve movement for soli and chorus, written in a plain massive style, ends a work which, taken for all in all, does credit to English art, and deserves a place among the worthy things.

God goeth up with shouting. A Sacred Cantata, composed by John Sebastian Bach. Pianoforte accompaniment arranged by Robert Franz. Text translated and adapted by the Rev. W. H. Milman, M.A.

Every lover of music will welcome this addition to Church Cantatas by Sebastian Bach which the publishers are placing within the reach of the humblest. We cannot have too many of them, for even the least valuable contains something worth possessing, or contributes its quota to our knowledge of the illustrious composer's genius and method. The Cantata before us is certainly not the least valuable; indeed we should prefer to rank it among the best, inasmuch as the noblest characteristics of the master are exemplified. It sets out with a fugal Chorus, "The Lord goeth up," in Bach's clearest, most vigorous, and most effective style. Here there are no complications, such as elsewhere in the composer's works suggests that he sometimes forgot the difference between music for voices and music for instruments. The fugue is eminently vocal throughout, and its important dimensions qualify it for use with advantage as an Anthem at the approaching Eastertide. A Recitative, "To day the Highest," separates this number from a tenor Air, "Ten thousand times thousand," belonging to the robust and, if the word may be pardoned, rollicking class which counts so many examples in Bach's works. It taxes heavily both the endurance and skill of the vocalist; but the effect of it as illustrating the jubilant text is great and worth the pains of securing. A second short Recitative describing the Ascension follows, leading to a soprano Air, "Our Jesus hath for aye," which we class among the loveliest in all Bach's works, as marked not only by his unfailing inventiveness but by a grace and expression more than common. Every musician as he first makes the acquaintance of this solo will dwell upon it with delight. An "accompanied" and grandiose bass Recitative, "He comes, the Lord of lords," next introduces an Air of the same character for the same voice, "'Tis He who all alone hath trodden well the winepress." This is a favourable example of the master's florid style, and, like its predecessor for tenor, exacts a good deal from the executant. A Song for contralto, "My spirit him descries," is, judged by the taste of the present day, more ingenious than pleasing, but after it the Cantata closes well with a Choral, "O Jesus Christ, thou dearest Lord," the simple beauty of which will unite all suffrages in its favour. We repeat that musicians everywhere cannot but find pleasure in adding this work to their Bach collection.

Palestine. A Sacred Oratorio. The words by Reginald Heber. The music by William Crotch, Mus. Doc., Professor of Music in the University of Oxford. Edited, and the Pianoforte accompaniment revised, by Berthold Tours.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Public attention having been called to the merits of this fine work by its performance at the Sacred Harmonic Society during the past month, the appearance of this octavo edition is well timed; for there can be little doubt that, although English composers are rising around us who have won a fame as Oratorio writers, we can ill afford to ignore one who proved his worth at a period when the production of a composition of such importance was regarded almost as an act of daring. It seems strange indeed that so little should be known of an artist who was not only celebrated as "Master Crotch, the Musical Child," but who was Professor of Music at the University of Oxford, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, lecturer on the art at the Royal Institution, and the composer of several sacred works, including another Oratorio besides the one just published, called "The Captivity of Judah," which was produced in the theatre at Oxford in 1834, on the occasion of the installation of the Duke of Wellington as Chancellor of the University. Mr. Berthold Tours has most carefully edited and skilfully revised the pianoforte part of the edition of "Palestine," which for the first time places the work in a form appealing to the many; and Choral Societies will now have an opportunity of adding to their répertoire an Oratorio of which, indeed, every countryman of its composer has a right to feel proud.

Elijah. A Sacred Oratorio, by F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy. Pianoforte arrangement by Berthold Tours.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The arrangement of an Oratorio for our household instrument is by no means an easy task; for on one hand there is the danger of crowding in so many of the choral and orchestral parts as to weary the performer and dissatisfy the listener; and on the other there is a fear that in the attempt to simplify the score sufficiently to bring the transcription within the reach of average players the effect will be feeble. Mr. Berthold Tours has, we are bound to say, steered clear of both these difficulties, and has presented us with a pianoforte version of Mendelssohn's popular work which vividly recalls its numerous beauties in the original form. We may especially point to the choruses, "Yet doth the Lord see it not," "Blessed are the men," "He, watching over Israel," and "Behold, God the Lord," as masterly specimens of arrangement; and the duet of the Prophet with the Widow is also skilfully brought under the hands. This transcription will no doubt be widely spread amongst musical amateurs.

Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in F. By E. H. Birch, Mus. Bac.

The Creed of St. Athanasius. Composed by E. H. Birch, Mus. Bac.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Birch's Evening Service is quite modern in thought and feeling, and, without being secular in style, is altogether free from the dryness which characterises much of the older cathedral music. The music will be found by no means difficult, and is likely to be popular. We must, however, express our regret that Mr. Birch should have chosen the form of a "Canon 4 in 2" for the Gloria of the Magnificat; because, though correctly written, it is not equal to the rest of the piece. It seems to us rather laboured, and the composer would, we think, have been better advised to give his imagination freer scope, instead of fettering it with the limitations he has imposed upon himself. It is not every one, even of good musicians, who can write a really effective "Canon 4 in 2."

The "Athanasian Creed" is simply a double chant with varied harmonies, which requires no detailed notice.

The Morning and Evening Service set to music in the key of A. By F. Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Both choirmasters and choristers will hail with great satisfaction this grand service in its new octavo form—a form by the way which has almost entirely, and we think very wisely, taken the place of the old single parts. There are two versions of this work, Breitkopf and Härtel's and the one we have been most accustomed to see in this country, Messrs. Novello's. In this new edition Dr. Stainer, who has edited the work, has given us one or two valuable and important changes derived from the German version, and the service now stands in such a complete and readable form as to bring it within reach of the capabilities of many choirs who have hitherto been unable to perform it with effect.

The Union Psalter. Psalms and other portions of Scripture pointed for chanting. By William Lockett, Organist of Union Chapel, Oxford Road, Manchester.

[Hodder and Stoughton.]

This little book is published for the use of Nonconformists, and in its way is most commendable. Undoubtedly the pointing of a Psalter is a most difficult task, because the same passage may frequently be read or accented in more than one way. However, of the book under notice it certainly may be said that upon the whole the pointing assists in giving an intelligent reading of the text, which is saying much in its favour. We have long noticed the improvements which are taking place in the architecture of places for Nonconformist worship, and congratulate those who belong to this class of the community on having a book which must tend to greatly improve the ornateness of the musical part of their services.

Our conversation is in heaven. The righteous live for evermore. Anthems for four voices. Composed by Oliveria L. Prescott. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

Miss Prescott is a student at the Royal Academy of Music and a pupil of Professor Macfarren. Several of her compositions have from time to time been performed at the Concerts of the Academy pupils, and occasionally also elsewhere. The Anthems before us give proof of sound training, and are highly creditable as a student's production, but they are of scarcely sufficient importance to enable us to pass any opinion as to the amount of inventive power possessed by the composer. "Our conversation is in heaven" is simply a piece of smooth and flowing part-writing. "The righteous live for evermore" is more interesting in its ideas. The episode at the words, "Therefore shall they receive a glorious kingdom," is very good, and the return to the first subject on page 6 is well managed. Miss Prescott's vocal harmony is so correct that we are surprised to find that she has not been more careful with her organ part. In the last two bars of the first page she gives consecutive octaves between extreme parts, which are the more noticeable from the fact that the upper part is above the voice, while another instance of consecutive octaves in the organ part may be seen in the last bar but one of page 2.

Shew me Thy ways, Full Anthem; Save me, O God, Full Anthem, composed by Alfred Alexander (Novello, Ewer and Co.), are two short pieces by a composer whose name is new to us. They show very good musical feeling, and are well written for the voices. The enharmonic change at the foot of the second page of "Shew me Thy ways" looks harder than it is in reality. We can recommend these little Anthems to parochial choirs.

An Order of Service for use at a Harvest Thanksgiving (Novello, Ewer and Co.) is issued by the London Gregorian Choral Association, and will be found well adapted to its object in churches where Gregorian music is used.

Musical Tales, Phantasms, and Sketches. Translated from the German of Elise Polko, by Mary P. Maudslay. Second series. [Samuel Tinsley.]

The sympathetic feeling for art and artists which pervades every sketch in this volume will surprise no one who has read the charming Reminiscences of Mendelssohn by the same authoress; but, apart from their attraction in a musical point of view, many of the tales have such strong human interest that they should meet with a cordial welcome even from those who read for the story alone. Presuming that the facts are authentic, we may say that "The Last Viol di Gamba Player" contains much that will enchain the attention of the musical student; for, although we all know the wandering life of Carl Friedrich Abel, and have heard that he died in London, we are but little acquainted with the pathetic episodes in his checkered career. That the instrument with which he had so long delighted every sensitive ear "was laid in his coffin" may be accepted as a proof of the respect paid to his memory; but it was a prophetic incident, for, as our authoress says, "Carl Friedrich Abel was the last performer on the viol di gamba." We may also mention as especially deserving of praise "The Song of the Bee," "Bach in London" (which reveals some curious incidents of this artist's life in the metropolis). "The Quiet Student," and "A Surprise," although many others might be named which have very considerable merit. The translation is extremely good—so good indeed that, save for a very few German expressions, we might fancy the tales were written by an Englishwoman. The work is elegantly got up, and may be warmly recommended to those who love to read about music and musicians.

Elizabeth's Song. From "The Saint's Tragedy." By the Rev. Charles Kingsley. Set to music by Joseph Barnby. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

Mr. Barnby has evidently aimed at expressing Kingsley's words in preference to writing a "selling" song, for a more unconventional composition we have rarely met with. Commencing with a short symphony in G minor $\frac{2}{4}$ time, the voice begins in the same key $\frac{6}{8}$ time, and changes to $\frac{2}{4}$ in the tonic major, on the words "Happy birds!" So musicianlike a colouring of these verses will no doubt be appreciated by those whose taste is not too much fettered by pedantic rules; and we trust that the good opinion of this artistic minority will amply repay the composer for daring to think solely in sympathy with the poet.

The Child-Angels. Song. Words by Frederick E. Weatherley.

The Maiden and the Sunbeam. Song. Written by Charles J. Rowe. Composed by Berthold Tours. [Evans and Co.]

The simple nature of the words of these two vocal pieces is faithfully reflected in the music; and both compositions are sufficiently thoughtful and artistic to sustain, if not to add to, the fame of one of the most prolific of our song-writers. "The Child-Angels," in G minor and major, has a pathetic theme, well adapted for a contralto voice, the accompaniment having but little independent character, but giving much intensity to the vocal part throughout. The second song is a perfect little musical poem, the tones of the organ, to which the child listens in wonder, being well imitated by the dragging left-hand passages in the accompaniment. We could wish that modern composers would choose poetry for musical setting breathing more of the happiness lying around the world of childhood: certainly, a song beginning "There was rain in the city churchyard," is scarcely suitable for drawing-room singing; but when we get music as good as Mr. Tours has wedded to these sombre verses, we have less right perhaps to complain.

Husarenritt. Tonbild aus dem Krieger, für Pianoforte, von Fritz Spindler. Easy arrangement by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The admirers of this popular piece whose fingers are not yet thoroughly under their control will be glad to find that a simplified version of it is now within their reach, the arrangement of which has been undertaken by an artist so competent for his task that the salient points of the composition are retained, whilst all the passages are placed easily under little hands. We cordially recommend this spirited Galop in its present shape to young players; and may mention that it is also published as a Duet.

Four Sketches for the Pianoforte. Composed by C. H. H. Sippel. [Metzler and Co.]

These sketches show some musical feeling; but the composer has evidently been fascinated by the fragmentary style of writing which so fatally stands in the way of solid advancement. No. 1—with the somewhat affected title "Funny"—is a feeble little piece, in D minor; and No. 2, called "What is it?" is little more than a study of chords of the sixth. No. 3, however—"Farewell," a flowing little piece in $\frac{12}{8}$ time—is melodious; but Mr. Sippel must be careful, even in so unpretending a composition, not to let his two parts drop together in such unpleasant octaves and fifths as occur between bars six and seven, page 6; one and two, page 7; and six and seven, page 7. No. 4, "Longing," is by far the best of the four sketches. In this we have a more defined melody; but even here there is a vagueness which seems to result from the habit of allowing the fingers to wander over the keyboard. If Mr. Sippel were to study earnestly, shun catching "titles," and write with an artistic aim, we think he might be successful.

Six Pensées Musicales pour Piano. Par Rosa Guerini, née Wilberforce. [Milan: Jean Canti.]

The composer of these thoughtful little pieces is a stranger to us; but she writes so well that we may hope to hear more of her in the future. No. 1, "Etude," is a smooth and graceful sketch, which, apart from its attraction to the listener, will prove an excellent exercise for the student. No. 2, "Pensée Fugitive" (inscribed "A ma mère"), derives much of its effect from the figure in the bass. The alternation between the tonic minor and major gives much freshness to the theme, which is appropriately tender and refined in character. No. 3, "Pourquoi," although written with fluency, and sufficiently suggestive of its quaint title, is scarcely so much to our mind as No. 4, a song without words, in F sharp minor, every bar of which is full of meaning. No. 5, "Souvenir," is a more clever trifle; but No. 6—a scherzo, with a trio and coda—is instinct with musical life, and should become a favourite with pianists educated to the appreciation of form and coherence of design, to whom, indeed, we cordially commend the whole of these unpretentious trifles.

March of the Templars, from "The Crusaders." By Dr. Hiles.

Two Movements, from "The Crusaders." By Dr. Hiles. Arranged for the Organ by George Marsden, Mus. Bac. [Forsyth Brothers.]

This March is fairly interesting, easy to play, and will go very well even on a small organ. The name of the composer will be a sufficient warrant for the proper manipulation of whatever may be the subject of the composition.

The first of the "Two Movements" is of the organ-andante species, and will make an effective introductory voluntary. The second is an arrangement of a chorus, and will be found suitable for a short concluding voluntary. Both are good, distinctly easy, and suitable either for small or large organs.

March for the Organ (in F major). Composed by Frederick Iliffe, Mus. Bac. Arranged by W. J. Westbrook, Mus. Bac. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This is undoubtedly an effective March, and there is much to admire in it, though one is frequently reminded of two well-known compositions of the same kind. To the March-loving public, however, it will be very acceptable, and a slight lack of freshness will help to commend it rather than otherwise. The subjects are of a classical mould and treated in a befitting manner. The arranger's work has been done so as to interest a good performer, and yet not to tax his powers of manipulation to any great extent.

FOREIGN NOTES.

At the Paris National Opera the works of the chief originator of what is specifically termed grand-opéra—to wit, Giacomo Meyerbeer—experience just now a general revival, and during the past month the répertoire mainly consisted of alternate performances of "L'Africaine," "Le Prophète," "Robert le Diable," and "Les Huguenots." The mise-en-scène of the first-mentioned work, upon which special care had been bestowed, is said to have involved the enormous expense of 270,000 francs. The same composer's "L'Etoile du Nord" has been in active preparation at the Opéra-Comique during the last few weeks, M. Nicot and Mdlle. Bilbaut-Vauchelet being cast for the principal rôles. The young tenor, M. Sellier, to whom a brilliant future had been predicted, and who was to have sung the principal part in M. Gounod's new operatic work "Polyeucte," has, it is said, abandoned his projected début in that opera. He made his first appearance last month at the Grand-Opéra as Arnold in "Guillaume Tell," without, however, as yet realising the expectations which his success at the last concours of the Conservatoire had raised. At the Bouffes-Parisiens M. Offenbach's new Operetta was brought out for the first time on the 13th ult. It is entitled "Maître Petronilla," the libretto being from the pen of an anonymous author. To judge from the tone adopted by the Parisian press, it may be questioned, however, whether the new work of the volatile maestro will hit the popular taste as much as his previous Operettas. Among concert performances the production of Berlioz's "Requiem" at the Châtelet, and of Niels Gade's legend, "La Fille du Roi des Aulnes," at M. Colonne's concerts, have attracted special attention, several repetitions having already taken place. A propos of the forthcoming International Exhibition the following concerts have been officially announced to form part of the musical programme—viz., four concerts with vocal and instrumental soli and orchestra; six concerts with orchestra, chorus, and soli; twelve of sacred music for organ, &c.; four specially reserved for vocal Societies, four intended in the same manner for military bands; sixteen for chamber music; in addition to which a number of popular concerts are contemplated. Many of the leading foreign musical Societies and orchestral bodies have already signified their intention of taking part in the performances; and some 18,000 candidates have, so far, sent in their names for the musical competitions which are to take place on July 14 and 17.

M. Colonne, the indefatigable leader of the Concerts Populaires, has been accorded a state subvention of 25,000 francs in support of his excellent undertaking, a fact which speaks well for the discrimination of the French Minister of Fine Arts.

The visit to Paris of a number of Spanish students, amateur musicians, is a curiosity worth mentioning, if only for the sake of the originality of the undertaking. The troupe is composed of some seventy young men forming what is termed in Spanish an estudiantina. They are dressed in the garb of the students of Salamanca of the sixteenth century, and amongst their number sixteen play the guitar, six the lute, ten the violin, eight the flute, and ten the tambourine. Their appearance has created quite a little sensation in the French capital, and the Concerts which they gave at the Italiens were crowded to excess.

According to the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung the projected artistic expedition on the part of the members of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Vienna, who proposed giving a series of Concert performances at Paris during the Exhibition, has now been definitely abandoned. Difficulties presenting themselves in the way of financial arrangements are said to have been the chief reason of the failure of the interesting project.

M. Gounod will, it is announced, personally conduct the first performance at Vienna of his Opera "Cinq-Mars."

Under the title of "La France Poétique et Musicale," a Society has just been formed in Paris, under the presidency of M. Victor Hugo, whose object it will be chiefly to make known the works of its members to the general public.

On the occasion of the first centenary of the death of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, some appropriate festivities will be held at the town of Geneva, his birthplace, and in which music is to take an important part. The great philosopher and composer died on the 3rd of July, 1778.

M. Victor Massé has resigned his functions as chef of the chorus at the Paris Opéra, in consequence of ill-health, and the vacant post has been filled by M. Jules Cohen, a professor of the Conservatoire.

Madame Norman-Neruda, the eminent violinist, has arrived in the French capital, and made her first appearance this season at the Concerts Populaires on the 24th ult.

The collection of instruments of the Bruxelles Conservatoire has, according to the Guide Musical de Bruxelles, lately received some important and interesting additions, namely, a spinet marked "Albertus Delin me fecit, Tornaci, 1770" (the gift of the director, M. Gevært); a theorbo inscribed "Joannes Storino fecit, anno Domini 1725;" and an arch-lute, marked "Mattea Sellas alla corona, Venezia"—two rare and beautiful specimens, which the custodian of the Bruxelles collection was fortunate enough to acquire in Rome.

The following valuable and interesting relics have been presented by private donors to the museum of the Philharmonic Society of Vienna, viz., a portrait in haut relief of Mozart, a miniature portrait of Haydn, and the pianoforte which had been presented to the latter during his stay in London. The instrument had hitherto formed part of the collection of the late Viennese Capellmeister Herbeck.

The Season of Opera at St. Petersburg has just come to a close, having been an unusually brilliant one, the troubles in the East notwithstanding. Madame Nilsson is said never to have been in better voice. Mdlle. Ehnn (of the Imperial Opera at Vienna) and Madame Gerster-Gardini were likewise the recipients of numerous public ovations, the former being especially admired in her impersonation of "Mignon" in M. Thomas's Opera. Previous to her leaving Russia, Madame Nilsson gave a grand Concert for the benefit of the wounded in the late campaign. The gifted artist has been nominated Court-singer by the Emperor of Russia, and has been decorated with the Order for "Arts and Sciences."

At Berlin the season of Italian Opera at the Kroll'sche Theater commenced on the 14th ult. with a performance of Rossini's "Il Barbiere." The principal rôles were divided among Signora Ricci (Rosina), Signor Perugini (Almaviva), and Signor Giannini (Figaro). The undertaking seems likely to prove a success. At the Royal Opera Madame Trebelli has recently created much enthusiasm in the character of Azucena in "Il Trovatore;" Madame Gerster-Gardini was expected to commence a series of impersonations at the same establishment on the 21st ult. A new operatic work by Herr Abert, entitled "Ekkehard," is in active preparation, and will probably be the only additional novelty which the Berlin Opera will produce during the present season. The projected performance of "Die Walküre" will, it is now stated, not be realised, at all events during the current campaign, Herr Wagner having refused to grant his permission to the directors of the Berlin establishment, except on condition that the entire work, "Der Ring des Nibelungen," is taken in hand.

Herr Max Bruch has just completed a new work, written in the form of an Oratorio for orchestra, chorus, and soli, and entitled "Das Lied von der Glocke"; it is to be performed for the first time at Cologne next month.

The new series of Lieder (Op. 48) recently published by Robert Franz has quickly found so many admirers that it has already become necessary to issue a second edition.

Rubinstein's Opera "Die Maccabäer" achieved a great success on the occasion of its first performance at the Imperial Opera at Vienna on February 25, since when numerous repetitions of the work have taken place.

At Prague the intended production of a new opera by Bendl entitled "Die Montenegriner" has been prohibited by the police authorities.

The Viennese Conservatorium has just sustained a great loss, Madame Marchesi, the gifted professor of singing having, in consequence of a difference with the directors, abruptly terminated her connection with the Institution. The vacant professorship is said to have been offered to Herr Julius Stockhausen, the eminent baritone and leader of the Berlin Sternsche Gesangverein.

The performances of Italian Opera at the Imperial establishment at Vienna commenced on the 19th ult., under the conductorship of Signor Arditi. Among the eminent vocalists who will appear during the contemplated twenty-four performances are mentioned, Mesdames Nilsson, Trebelli, Salla, and MM. Faure, Masini, Campanini, and Behrens.

At Bruxelles, the famous quartett-party led by Jean Becker have recently created much enthusiasm in a series of concerts, including works by Mozart, Beethoven, Raff, Rubinstein, and Cherubini. At a concert given by the Association des Artistes Musiciens, Wagner's Symphonic-poem, "Siegfried Idyl," was extremely well received, the programme including also the same composer's "Walkürenritt" (from the Tetralogy), arranged for the pianoforte by Brassin, which was played with great brilliancy by M. Franz Rummel.

Madame Adelina Patti is said to have received the sum of 422,000 francs in gold for forty-two performances in Italy during the last four months.

The Munich tenor, Herr Nachbaur, has been extremely well received at Rome, where he made his début in "Lohengrin;" he was also announced to appear, together with Madame Pauline Lucca, in "Faust" and "Les Huguenots."

The only daughter of Cherubini, Madame Zenobia Rossetti, is still living at Pisa, where the composer's "Requiem" was recently performed on the occasion of the death of the late King, Victor Emmanuel. The attention of the present monarch having been called to the fact, he has graciously granted a pension to the near relative of the great maestro.

Madame Rossini, née Olympe Pélissier, the widow of the composer of "Guillaume Tell," died on the 22nd ult. at her villa at Passy, near Paris, at the age of seventy-eight. She was married to the composer in 1845, shortly after the death of his first wife, Isabelle Colbrand, from whom he had been long separated. The deceased lady leaves the whole of her personal fortune (about a million of francs) to be devoted to the erection of an asylum for French and Italian vocal artists.

At Coblenz, his native town, died on February 22, at the age of eighty-five, François Hünten, the well-known composer of easy and pleasing pianoforte music, and author of a méthode de piano at one time much in use. After having lived many years in Paris, where he gained a great reputation, he retired to his native town in 1847, passing the remainder of his days in easy circumstances.

The death also is announced, at Florence, of the once famous tenor Mariani, for whom Donizetti wrote the part of Gennaro in "Lucrezia Borgia." He had just completed his seventieth year.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert Populaire (March 3): Symphony, D major (Mozart); "Tasso," Poëme-Symphonique (Liszt); Intermezzo (F. Lachner); Pianoforte Concerto, No. 4 (Saint-Saëns); Fragments from the "Sérénade," Op. 8 (Beethoven); Overture to "La Chasse du jeune Henri" (Méhul). Concert Populaire (March 10): Overture to "Le Roi d'Ys" (Lalo); Chorus from "Oberon" (Weber); Thème Slave varié (Delibes); Fragments from "Iphigénie en Aulide" (Gluck); Choral Symphony (Beethoven). Concert de l'Association Artistique (March 10): "La Fille du Roi des Aulnes" (Niels W. Gade); Variations on a Theme by Beethoven for two pianofortes (Saint-Saëns); Overture, "Der Freischütz" (Weber), &c. Concert du Conservatoire (March 17): Choral Symphony (Beethoven); Romance from a Symphony (Haydn); Chorus, "La Mort d'Ophélie" (Berlioz); Overture to "Oberon" (Weber). Concert Populaire (March 17): Symphony, "Harold" (Berlioz); Concerto for Pianoforte (Grieg); Fragments from "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn), &c. Concert du Châtelet (March 17): "Requiem" (Berlioz). Concert Populaire (March 24): Symphony in F major (Beethoven); Symphony, "Le Forêt enchantée" (d'Indy); Violin Concerto (Viotti); "Le Rouet d'Omphale" (Saint-Saëns); Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber).

Leipzig.—Euterpe Concert (Feb. 26): Funeral March from "Alexandrea" (Zopff); Symphony, D major (Haydn); Siegfried Idyl (Wagner); Suite for Violin (Ries); Overture, "Egmont" (Beethoven). Gewandhaus Concert (Feb. 28): Frühlings-Fantasie (Gade); Serenade for String-Quartett (Volkmann), Concerto, D minor (Rubinstein); Symphony, A major (Mendelssohn). Gewandhaus Concert (March 7): Mass in C and Ninth Symphony (Beethoven). Conservatorium Concert (March 8): String Trio, G major (Beethoven); Ditto, D minor (Mendelssohn); Violin Sonata (Umlauft). Singakademie (March 10): Bach's "Magnificat" and Mozart's "Requiem."

Berlin.—Symphonie-Kapelle (February 27): Overture "La Clemenza di Tito" (Mozart); Symphony, D major (Mozart); Ocean Symphony (Rubinstein); Todtentänze (Heidingsfeld); Overture, "Heimkehr" (Mendelssohn). Singakademie (March 8): Oratorio, "Christus" (Kiel). Bilse Concert (March 6): Overture, "Beethoven" (Lassen); Prelude, "Queen of Sheba" (Goldmark); "Tasso" (Liszt); Siegfried Idyl (Wagner), &c. Symphonie-Kapelle (March 6): Overture, "Idomeneo" (Mozart); Fragments from "Roméo et Juliet" (Berlioz); "Eroica" (Beethoven); Overture, "Girondisten" (Litolff). Bilse Concert (March 9): Overture, "Weihe des Hauses" (Beethoven); Huldigungsmarsch (Wagner); Rhapsody in F (Liszt); Ocean Symphony (Rubinstein), &c. Cäcilienverein (March 25): "Faust" Music (Schumann).

CORRESPONDENCE.

JAMES LEACH OF ROCHDALE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Inquiries have been lately made in America respecting some hymn-tunes by Leach, which are found in collections published in the United States at the close of the last and the beginning of the present centuries. The tune named "Fountain" is in a music-book of 127 pages, called "Easy Instructor," which was printed at Albany in 1798 and published by Little and Smith. In "The Bridgewater Collection of Sacred Music," first edition, printed in Boston in 1802, are "Hampton," "Wilderness," "Bridgewater," "Fountain," "Hamilton," "Morning Flower," and "Sepulchre;" and in a book called "David Companion, or the Methodist Standard"—the compilation of which was ordered by the General Conference at Baltimore, May 26, 1808, and which was registered as copyright July 28, 1810—are forty-eight pieces of music by James Leach. From that time forward Leach's tunes were included in most of the American collections. Several of them attained considerable popularity in England, but, with many other tunes of their period, are now disappearing from modern hymnals. A few lines respecting Leach and his tunes may interest some of your American readers.

James Leach, of Rochdale, Yorkshire, was a counter-tenor singer and a member of the King's Band. He was born in 1762, and was killed by a stage-coach accident in the spring of 1797. In 1789 he published "A New Sett of Hymns and Psalm Tunes adapted for the Use of Churches, Chapels, & Sunday Schools, with Accompaniments & a Thoro' Bass, the whole figured for the Organ, Harpsichord, or Piano-Forte, Composed by J. Leach, Rochdale. London. Printed for the Author, & Sold by Preston & Son at their Warehouses, 97, Strand, and Exeter Change. T. Beale, Music Seller, Manchester, and to be had at all the Music Shops in the Kingdom." The preface is dated June 29, 1789, and states that some of the tunes were written "a few years ago," and "got handed about." Hence their publication. "A Second Sett of Hymns and Psalm Tunes," &c., was published in Leach's lifetime. It is not dated, but refers in the preface to the former set of "a few years ago." The date of the second set is probably about 1794 or 1795. To an edition of it published after the composer's death an advertisement is appended, dated "Manchester, 1798," which states that "the sudden death of Mr. Leach had reduced his family to very necessitous circumstances," and soliciting subscriptions towards publishing sundry MS. anthems, &c., for the benefit of the family.

Later impressions of both "setts" were printed from the original plates, but are without the prefaces. A copy in my possession bears the date 1812 in the water-mark in the fly-leaf.

The tunes and other pieces in the two volumes are as follow:—

First Sett.—New Trumpet, Rochdale, Standing, Townhead, Traveling, Supplication, Shepherd's Lover, Mystery, Hamilton, Fountain, Complaint, Sabbath, Oldham, Mount Pleasant, Pisgah, Failsworth, Jordan, Bethel, Jerusalem, Melody, Nativity, and Middleton. After these come two long pieces, with instrumental accompaniments: "The Tribunal," a setting of the hymn, "He comes, he comes, the Judge severe;" and "The Second Coming of Christ," to the hymn, "Lo, He comes with clouds descending."

Second Sett.—Redemption, Funeral, Judgment, Harmony, Rest, Refuge, Hermit, St. John, Mount Zion, Bethlehem, Mount Hermon, Lebanon, Pastoral, Wrestling Jacob, Morning Flower, Aphek, Sepulchre, Peru, Joannes vel Momenti Mores (the engraver's version, I presume, of Memento mori), Jehudijah, Mourner, Triumph, Wilderness, Infancy, Smyrna, Palestine, New Windsor, Patmos, Salford, Mount Tabor, Penitent, Mount Carmel, Pilgrim, Sheilds, Tabernacle, Mehetabel, Hallelujah, Judea, Mount Nebo, Syria, Alexandria, Cyprus, Nile, Watchman, Egypt, Orpheus, Sharon, Gaza, Reumah, Calvary, and Canaan. The last three of these are long pieces. The above names are those given to the tunes by Leach himself, and they seem to have been pretty generally adhered to; but the tune "Bridgewater" in the American collection is identical with that originally called "Sheilds."* A tune named Knaresborough, and ascribed to Leach, is, I believe, an adaptation from one of his anthems. The first set of tunes forms a volume containing fifty-eight pages; the second set sixty-nine pages, both oblong quarto. Besides the two books of hymn-tunes, Leach's published works include some anthems and, I am informed, trios for two violins and a bass viol.—Yours faithfully, G. A. C.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The long-continued depression existing among all classes of producers, manufacturers, and traders throughout the States has had much influence upon musical ventures here, with few exceptions. It is understood, however, that a season of Italian Opera will be given in some of the chief cities by the Strackosch company, enlarged for the purpose, later in the season. The company comprises, among others of note, those accomplished artists—Clara Louise Kellogg, Annie Louise Cary, and Madame Marie Roze. Other travelling companies are also trying their fortunes in various parts of the country, some meeting with fair success. Here we are having our usual number of Symphony Concerts by the Harvard Musical Association, which gives us each year some very fine entertainments (although they are inadequately supported), and similar concerts are also given by the celebrated Thomas Orchestra. Our old Handel and Haydn Society, too, is cautiously feeling its way through the season, and affording us opportunities of hearing some superb specimens of chorus-singing in connection always with the best solo talent obtainable. Carl Zerrahn still holds the baton for this Society, as he does also for the Harvard Musical, a position he has occupied in the first-named organisation for more than a quarter of a century; and much of the success of the Society may be fairly attributable to his able management in the particular department under his control. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" is the next announced performance by this Society, and is to take place on the 6th inst., to be followed at Easter by Haydn's "Creation."

Our two male-voice singing clubs, the "Apollo" and the "Boylston," are giving some excellent performances this season, the first under the conductorship of Mr. B. J. Lang, and the other under that of Mr. Geo. L. Osgood; both capable and entirely equal to their respective positions, and both laudably ambitious to excel. The auxiliary female chorus of the "Boylston" and the "Cecilia" Society (a small company of mixed voices) are also giving us some good concerts.

Setting aside some occasional performances of a less noteworthy character, our musical season may be thus hastily summed up.—Yours truly, Loring B. Barnes.

Boston, U.S.A., March 1, 1878.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Our attention has been called to a paragraph in the February number of the Musical Times, that we had removed our pianoforte factory from Wardour Street. This is not exactly the case, as it is only our show-rooms and offices we have removed to No. 40, Great Marlborough Street; our factories being still where they have always been, at the Apollo Works, Kentish Town; and we have no connection whatever with any firm of a similar name to ours in Wardour Street.

Your insertion of the above in your next issue will much oblige.—Yours faithfully, Arthur Allison & Co.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Will some of your readers kindly inform me if there is not an easier mechanical method of blowing a small organ or pedal harmonium than by attaching an hydraulic engine?

If you could ventilate the subject a little in your columns, I feel sure you would be conferring a great favour upon many lovers of sacred music, including myself.—Trusting you will oblige, yours obediently, C. S.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Aberdeen.—The University Choral Society gave its Annual Concert at the Music Hall on the 8th ult. before a large audience. In the first part of the programme, Sir Herbert Oakeley's Students' Song, "Alma Mater" (accompanied on the organ by the composer), was rapturously received, and his Organ Solo, "Edinburgh" (composed by the Professor for the Liverpool Musical Festival of 1874), also elicited the warmest marks of approbation. The part-singing was generally extremely good, and the concert was in every respect highly successful.——On the 9th ult. Sir Herbert Oakeley gave a Lecture on Madrigals, in which he traced with much clearness the history of these compositions, illustrating his remarks by some of the best specimens, which were excellently rendered by the Musical Association. The lecture was listened to with the utmost interest by a large audience; and at the close of his address a vote of thanks to Sir Herbert Oakeley was proposed by Professor Black.

Abingdon.—On Wednesday the 6th ult. a Musical Lecture was given in the Wesleyan Schoolroom by the Rev. S. V. Lewis, entitled "An Evening with the Fairies," on the popular superstitions of Wales and other old countries. Characteristic Welsh songs and part-songs were well rendered by Mrs. T. B. Kendall, Miss Fewster, Mr. C. Lewis, and Mr. H. Clarke; Mrs. G. Davis being a skilful accompanist. The musical portion of the programme included a "Fantasia on Welsh Airs," by Brinley Richards, brilliantly executed by Mrs. T. B. Kendall (née Hellis), a former certificated pupil of the composer's; a Song and Chorus, "Wales," by Mr. H. Clarke; "The Bells of Aberdovey," by Mrs. T. B. Kendall; and other songs, &c. The proceeds of the entertainment were for the relief of the families of the unemployed miners of South Wales.

Adelaide, South Australia.—The services in connection with the consecration of the first portion of the Cathedral Church of St. Peter's, held in the Octave commencing Sunday, December 30, 1877, and ending Sunday, January 6, 1878, were highly creditable. The

* The Worcester Collection of Sacred Harmony, by Isaiah Thomas, Worcester, Massachusetts, 1786, contains a totally different "Bridgewater," by Edson, an American composer.

Bishops of Melbourne and Ballarat were present and assisted in the services. The Organist and Choirmaster, Messrs. Boult and Vandrey, deserve the highest praise for the excellent music provided. Magnificats and Nunc dimittis by Garrett in D, Calkin in D, Parry in D, Berthold Tours in F, and Goss in A, Te Deum and Jubilate by Berthold Tours, Communion Office by Parry in D, and Anthems by Barnby, Stainer, Goss, and Berthold Tours, were all faultlessly rendered, especial praise being due to the solo singing of Master Merry, the Cantoris leader. A large organ of splendid tone, three manuals and thirty-four stops, built by Messrs. Bishop and Son, of London, was used on this occasion for the first time, and was much admired.

Beckenham, Kent.—On Thursday evening, the 28th February, the members of the Christ Church Choral Society, assisted by friends, gave their first Concert in the Christ Church Lecture Hall before a crowded audience. The programme was well arranged, and contained several Part-Songs, which were creditably sung by the choir. The Overture to Semiramide was admirably rendered as a pianoforte duet by Miss M. A. Yelving and Mr. P. C. Richardson, the latter also playing Dussek's Sonata, Op. 10; Mr. Gustave Heryfeld gave very brilliantly Schubert's Impromptu No. 4; Miss Minna Adderley, a very promising contralto, was warmly applauded for her refined and careful rendering of "The Lost Chord." Messrs. Pleyel, Wolff and Co. kindly lent a grand pianoforte for the occasion. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. J. F. Lockwood, Organist of St. George's, Albemarle Street, who was assisted in some of the accompaniments by Mr. F. W. Partridge, Organist of Christ Church. The concert was for the benefit of the Christ Church Sunday Schools.

Belfast.—A Concert was given in the Town Hall, Porterdown, on the 5th ult., in aid of the funds of the Society of St. Vincent-de-Paul, when the following artists took part: Madame Schroeder, Miss Lydstone, Mr. W. P. Moore, Herr Schroeder, and Herr L. Werner. Madame Schroeder, not only as a vocalist, but as a pianist, proved herself an artist of the first order. Herr Schroeder played several pieces on the zither, and Herr Werner accompanied the singers, and also played a pianoforte solo.——At the Concért of the Choral Association on the 15th ult., a large audience assembled in the Ulster Hall, the attraction being the engagement of Madame Norman-Néruda and Mr. Charles Hallé. The various pieces performed by these artists were highly appreciated. The singing of the part-songs by the members of the Society was especially good, reflecting the greatest credit on Mr. Newport's training; Henry Leslie's Part-Song, "The lullaby of life," especially, was exquisitely rendered, and received a well-merited encore.

Berwick-upon-Tweed.—The members of the Choral Union gave a very good performance of Haydn's Oratorio the Creation on the 5th ult. The soloists were Miss Robinson, of Wakefield; Mr. Richardson, of Berwick; and Mr. McCall, of York Minster. A small, but efficient orchestra, selected from the best performers in Edinburgh and Glasgow, played the accompaniments; Miss Cuthbertson presided at the harmonium. The choir, numbering upwards of 120 voices, sang with vigour and precision. The large hall of the Corn Exchange was filled with an appreciative audience. Mr. Barker conducted.

Birmingham.—An effective performance of Naaman took place at the Schoolroom of St. John's, Ladywood, on the 5th ult. The chorus numbered one hundred voices, and there was a small orchestra. The vocal solos were well given by Mrs. Parker, Miss Jeffcoate, Mr. Young, and Mr. Randell. Mr. S. Simms conducted.——The Festival Choral Society brought one of their most successful seasons to a close on the 7th ult. by a fine performance of the Mount of Olives and the Creation. The version originally prepared by Mr. Bartholomew for the festival of 1855 was used for the former work, but it is to be hoped that the example set by Leeds last year will be followed in the future. The principal vocalists were Mrs. Osgood, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli; Mrs. Bellamy and Mr. Coley assisting in the Creation. All were highly efficient, the concerted pieces being exceedingly well rendered. The band was very good, and contributed materially to the success of the performance. Mr. Stimpson's accompaniments were most judicious, and the conducting of Mr. Stockley was characterised by great care and skill. There was a large and highly appreciative audience.

Bristol.—On Thursday the 28th of February a Concert was given in the Colston Hall by the Orpheus Glee Society. The annual open or ladies' night of this Society is always anxiously looked forward to; but this year a change was made in consequence of the lamented death of the able Conductor of the Society, the late Mr. Alfred Stone, and the Society decided to give a Concert, the proceeds of which were to be given to the "Alfred Stone Memorial Fund," instead. The Concert commenced with the performance of an Ode written in memory of Mr. Stone, by the Rev. W. F. Callaway, a friend of the deceased, and arranged to the slow movement in Beethoven's Appassionata Sonata. The other items were from the works of Cooke, Hatton, Stevens, Hoesler, Graner, Ecker, and Eisenhofer; the only encore of the evening being awarded to Mr. B. Gay's artistic rendering of Moore's "Oft in the stilly night," the music of which was recently arranged by Mr. Stone. The large hall was filled, and it is hoped the Fund will be much benefited by the Concert. Mr. George Riseley conducted.——On the 4th ult. another of the enjoyable series of Monday Popular Concerts was given in the Colston Hall. The band of fifty performers, led by Mr. A. Waite, performed Raff's "Fest Marsch," Flotow's Overture "Stradella," Ascher's "Fanfare Militaire," and Niels W. Gade's "Sinfonie No. 4 in B flat," in capital style. Mr. Lawford Huxtable was the vocalist, and charmingly rendered Rossini's "Pro peccatis," and Gounod's Air, "Nazareth," &c.——The first Concert of the recently formed Bristol Handel Choral Society was given at the Lesser Colston Hall on the 5th ult. The principal object of the Society is the performance of the comparatively unknown works of Handel, but not excluding the compositions of other great masters. Choruses from Samson, Esther, and Joshua were especially well given, reflecting great credit on Mr. Whitaker, the Conductor and founder of the Society. The principal vocalists were Madame Bretelle, Mr. F. Jenkins, and Mr. Merrick. A small band of instrumentalists, headed by Mr. J. O. Brooke, accompanied, Mr. Skelding presided at the American organ, and, with Mr. Whitaker, divided the duty of accompanying the soloists.——Another Concert of the same series was given on the 18th ult. before a large audience. The programme included several Overtures, which were well played. Hummel's grand Concerto for Pianoforte in E, Op. 110, was splendidly rendered by Mr. J. L. Roeckel, who was well supported by the orchestra. Miss Ada Jackson was the vocalist, and Mr. George Riseley conducted both concerts.

Caversham.—The Annual Choir Concerts, unavoidably postponed in December, took place in the National Schoolroom on Thursday, the 28th February. The first part of the programme consisted of an entirely new Cantata, entitled the Song of the Months, the libretto being written by Sarah Howell, and the music composed by Mr. Francis Howell. The choral portions of this work are exceedingly good, particularly a Solo and Chorus for male voices, "Come to the fresh mown meadows," and the concluding Chorus, "Father Christmas;" and amongst the airs may be especially mentioned "The rose and swallow," which is well worthy of separate publication. The singing of the choir throughout was extremely good; indeed, we have seldom heard such precision and steadiness before in a village choir; and too much credit cannot be given to Mr. Cooke, the Choirmaster and Conductor, for the efficient state to which he has brought his choristers. Miss Noble acted as accompanist during the entire performance, and played with skill and effect. The proceeds of both concerts (which were on behalf of the choir) amounted to upwards of £18.

Chepstow.—On Monday evening, the 4th ult., Mr. T. Wainwright gave his Annual Concert at the Assembly Rooms, before a crowded and appreciative audience. J. F. Barnett's Cantata, the Ancient Mariner, and a miscellaneous selection formed the programme, which was rendered in a manner reflecting the highest credit both on the performers and their able Conductor, Mr. T. Wainwright. The principals were Madame Cross Lavers, Miss Foote, Mr. J. M. Hayden, and Mr. Henry Cross. Accompanists, Organ and Pianoforte, Miss H. S. Watkens and Mr. S. G. Hayward.

Chesterfield.—An Evening Concert took place in the Market Hall, in aid of the Stephenson Memorial Hall Fund on the 19th ult., before a large audience. The vocalists were Madame Thaddeus Wells, Madame George, Mr. T. Cooper, Mr. Wardle, and Mr. Brayshaw. An excellent band, under the leadership of Mr. W. Mountney, was engaged. Mr. H. N. Biggin, Organist of the Parish Church, presided at the pianoforte, and accompanied with much ability.

Clifton.—On Friday the 1st ult. Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy gave her fourth Classical Chamber Concert in the Victoria Rooms, and, as on previous occasions, there was a large audience. Beethoven's Quartett, Op. 18, No 4, served to display Herr Straus's dexterity as a violinist, and Chopin's "Impromptu," Op. 29, exhibited Mrs. Viner-Pomeroy's skill as a pianist. The programme also included Schumann's Quintett for piano and strings, and Schubert's String Quartett, Op. 29.——On Tuesday the 12th ult. a Concert was given at the Victoria Rooms by Miss Pearce, in aid of the Alfred Stone Memorial Fund. The following local artists gave their services on the occasion: Miss Ada Jackson, Madame Brettelle, Mr. Walter Kidner, and Mr. H. J. Dyer, vocalists; Miss Pearce contributing solos on the organ, and Signor Paggi a couple of flute solos. The concert was a very enjoyable one.

Coatbridge, near Glasgow.—An Organ Recital and Service of Sacred Music was given in the Coats Parish Church on Tuesday evening, the 19th ult. Mr. Frederic Archer, of the Alexandra Palace, London, presided at the organ, and rendered in a most efficient manner a choice selection from the works of the great masters. A well-balanced chorus of eighty voices gave a number of Choruses, under the Conductorship of Mr. Thomas Dixon, Organist of the Church. An exceedingly enjoyable evening was brought to a close by a performance of Handel's "Hallelujah."

Conway (N.W.).—A Complimentary Concert was given to Mr. J. C. Williams (a poet), residing here, in the Methodist Schoolroom on the 14th ult. The vocalists were Misses Abram and Evans and Messrs. E. M. Rowland and D. Gordon-Thomas (of the Bangor Cathedral Choir). Mr. Rowland (better known as "Eos Maelor" in Wales) gave a very artistic rendering of "The sailor's grave" (Sullivan), and a Welsh song entitled "Our banner so fair" (by J. Parry, Esq., Professor of Music at the University College of Wales). Mr. Thomas, who possesses a good bass voice, sang "Nancy Lee" and "Jack's Yarn" with good effect, and the other vocalists added much to the evening's enjoyment. The solo pianist was Mr. J. T. Pritchard (winner of a £40 prize at the Carnarvon National Eisteddfod, and pupil of Dr. Roland Rogers, Organist of Bangor Cathedral), who also accompanied most of the songs. There was a numerous audience.

Cork.—The series of Concerts under the management of Mr. James Scanlan, at the Opera House, has just been brought to a highly successful termination. The programmes have invariably been well selected, and both singers and instrumentalists have been enthusiastically received.

Dewsbury.—The first Festival of the Dewsbury and District Nonconformist Choral Union was held in the Trinity Congregational Chapel on Wednesday evening, February 27, George Hirst, Esq., President of the Union, in the chair. The programme included the Anthems "O Lord my God" (Wesley), "What are these" (Stainer), "O taste and see," and "The glory of the Lord" (Goss). The hymn-tunes were by J. B. Dykes, S. S. Wesley, E. J. Hopkins, J. Langran, R. Blakely, T. Porritt, J. Mills, and J. W. Dean. The singing of the united choirs, numbering about 240 members, was very good. A. H. Pyrah presided at the organ, and J. W. Dean conducted. The Rev. A. A. Ramsey, in a short but appropriate address, spoke eloquently of the importance of singing as part of divine worship, showing it to be the oldest of the fine arts.

Edinburgh.—The choral element was again very successfully introduced into Sir Herbert Oakeley's programme on the 13th ult., five of the numbers receiving the assistance of a select choir. Mendelssohn's Part-song, "O hills, O vales," had to be repeated, and all the other choral pieces were well received. Sir Herbert's beautiful Lied, "Happy Hours," was encored, a noticeable feature in the performance of the composition being the introduction as a solo stop of the contra fagotto (sixteen feet reed). The attendance was very large.

Finchley.—The Finchley Choral Society gave the last Concert of the season on the 25th ult. Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Cantata, the Woman of Samaria, formed the first part of the programme, the Solos being rendered by Miss José Sherrington, Miss Annie Butterworth, Mr. A. Lawrence Fryer, and Mr. Lawler, who gave the music with much expression. The unaccompanied Quartett, "God is a spirit," was most effective, and was encored. The band and chorus, consisting of seventy performers, attacked their portions vigorously, and acquitted themselves with commendable skill. The remainder of the programme consisted of ballads, part-songs, &c., Miss Sherrington and Miss Butterworth respectively gaining encores in Cowen's "Spinning" and "She wore a wreath of roses;" Mr. Fryer and Mr. Lawler also pleased the audience with Adams's "Blue Alsatian Mountains" and Pinsuti's "I fear no foe." The chorus sang Schumann's "Gipsy Life" and Stevens's "From Oberon in fairyland." Mr. G. R. Fletcher conducted, and there was a large audience.

Halifax.—On Tuesday evening, February 26th, a Concert under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society was given in the Mechanics' Hall, to a large audience of subscribers. The principal feature of the programme was Mendelssohn's Cantata, Lauda Sion, which was well rendered. The vocalists were Miss Tomlinson, Miss Cragg, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. Rickard, assisted by Dr. Horton Allison, pianist, the band of the Society, and the chorus of the Halifax Musical Society, under Mr. Whitaker's conductorship. Beethoven's Choral Fantasia concluded the first half of the programme, and a miscellaneous selection occupied the second part. Liszt's grand concert paraphrase from the Midsummer Night's Dream was exquisitely played by Dr. Allison on the pianoforte, and he was compelled to return in answer to an enthusiastic encore, when he played Thalberg's "Home, sweet Home."

High Wycombe.—An Organ Recital was given in Union Chapel on Wednesday the 20th ult. by Mr. Frederick G. Edwards, Organist and Director of the Choir of Christ Church, Westminster Road, London. The selection was from the works of Smart, Gade, Mendelssohn, Wesley, Batiste, and Costa; and a Bourrée of Bach's (arranged for the Organ by Mr. Edwards) was also included in the programme.

Hindley.—On Wednesday evening the 20th ult. a full Choral Service was held in All Saints' Church, to celebrate the reopening of the Organ. The choir was augmented to about fifty voices by the choir of St. Peter's, and Mr. C. D. Mortimer, Organist of St. Peter's, presided at the organ. After the opening voluntary, "Melodie in A flat," Guilmant, the hymn "Hark! hark! I hear the organ loudly peal," was splendidly sung by both choirs in unison, the Organist playing a free accompaniment. The two Anthems, "Break forth into joy," by T. Ridley Prentice, and "It came even to pass," Sir F. Ouseley, were also very well sung. After the second Anthem Mr. Mortimer played "Pastorale Cantatiene" (Guilmant), and "Vesper hymn, with variations" (E. H. Turpin). The alterations to the organ have been very successfully carried out by Messrs. Jardine and Co., of Manchester. A collection was made during the singing of the hymn "Brightly gleams our banner," to Dr. Sullivan's tune; and the March from Athalie (Mendelssohn) finished an interesting service.

Kidderminster.—The members of the Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio Elijah, in the Town Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 5th ult. The principal solos were sung by Mrs. Glover-Eaton (soprano), Miss E. Lloyd (contralto), Mr. J. Beach (tenor), and Messrs. Cotton and Muston (bass), the two latter gentlemen dividing the airs and recitatives of Elijah. Mr. W. Taylor presided at the organ, Mr. Wadeley at the piano, and Mr. Fitzgerald conducted. Altogether the band and chorus numbered seventy performers. The Choruses were very spiritedly taken up, especially "Baal, we cry to thee." The Quartett, "Cast thy burden," was excellently rendered by Mrs. Glover-Eaton, Miss Lloyd, Mr. J. Beach, and Mr. Cotton. The Aria, "Is not His word like a fire," was capitally given by Mr. Muston; and the Chorus, "Thanks be to God," was finely executed. In the second part, the Recitative, "The Lord hath exalted thee," was well rendered by Mr. Muston, and Miss Lloyd, in the part allotted to the Queen, was very effective. The Air, "It is enough," by Mr. Muston, with violoncello accompaniment by Mr. Horatio Smith, and the Terzetto, "Lift thine eyes," given with great precision by Miss Fitzgerald, Mrs. Glover-Eaton, and Miss Lloyd, were highly effective.

Lincoln.—Mr. J. Barratt gave a Ballad Concert in the Masonic Hall on Monday evening, the 11th ult. The vocalists were Madame Tonnelier, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. J. L. Wadmore. Mr. J. Barratt, Mus. Bac., Oxon, presided at the pianoforte. There was a most enthusiastic audience. The encores were numerous, and the concert highly successful.

Liverpool.—The eighty-second anniversary of the Apollo Glee Club was celebrated by the Annual Dinner on the 21st ult.; Mr. David Hunter, president, Messrs. W. Laidlaw and Thomas Armstrong, vice-presidents. An excellent selection of glees was well rendered by the performing members, including compositions by Dr. Callcott, Webbe, Bishop, G. Holden, J. Parry, &c. The club, which is one of the oldest in the kingdom, was reported to be in a prosperous condition. Mr. Skeaf presided at the piano.

Londonderry.—The St. Columb's Choral Union gave a performance of Handel's Messiah in the Corporation Hall on Wednesday evening, February 27th, under the direction of Mr. James Turpin, F.C.O., the Conductor of the Society. The principal vocalists were Miss Macdonald (soprano), Miss Bailey and Miss Stewart (altos), Mr. Kenneth M. Stewart (tenor), the Rev. J. Hogan and Mr. A. Kellock (basses), all of whom were highly successful. The Choruses were given by the members of the Society with remarkable firmness and precision. The Rev. J. Armstrong presided at the harmonium, and gave valuable assistance in the accompaniments. In every respect the performance was excellent.

Maidstone.—The St. Paul's Choral Society gave, on Tuesday the 19th ult., a very successful performance of Samson, in the Concert Hall of the Royal Exchange. The band and chorus consisted of about eighty performers. The band played the Overture and the "Dead March" with much precision, and interpreted the Sinfonia representing Confusion and Horror very successfully. The only professional singer was Mr. Rhodes, of Canterbury, who took the bass solos, his rendering of Manoah's and Harapha's parts showing good taste and careful study. Mrs. Johnson took the soprano solos, and was encored in "Let the bright Seraphim." Miss Wallis gave the contralto solos, and Mr. Crow the tenor. Mr. J. B. Groom conducted with much spirit, and showed a perfect command over his choir and band. The Choruses were remarkably well sung, especially "Fix'd in His everlasting seat," which was unanimously encored.

Malvern Link.—On Wednesday evening, February 27th, the members of the Malvern Link Choral Society, assisted by artists from Worcester, gave their first Concert, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Main, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Matthias. The first part consisted of Cowen's Cantata the Rose Maiden, and the second was miscellaneous. The solo vocalists were Miss Edwards (soprano), Miss M'Cann (contralto), Mr. Mann Dyson (tenor), and Mr. Millward (bass). The instrumentalists were Messrs. Spray and Elgar (first violins), Mr. W. H. Elgar (second violin), Mr. Smith (viola), Mr. H. Brookes (double bass), Miss Wyley (piano), and Mr. Henry Elgar (harmonium). The concert was in every respect a great success.

Manchester.—On the 5th ult. a large audience assembled at the Philharmonic Hall, on the occasion of the benefit of Mr. Charles Hallé. Beethoven's Choral Symphony and Mendelssohn's Walpurgis Night received a highly satisfactory rendering both from band and choir. The principal singers were Miss José Sherrington, Mdlle. Arnim, Mr. Henry Guy, and Herr Henschel. Beethoven's "Choral Fantasia" afforded Mr. Hallé an opportunity of exhibiting his exceptional powers as a pianist; and it is needless to say that his performance elicited the warmest applause. When Mr. Hallé was at the pianoforte Mr. Hecht conducted, and kept his forces well under command.——Mr. Yarwood gave a miscellaneous Concert on the 6th ult. in the Association Hall, Peter Street, which was a great success. There was a numerous attendance, and a well-performed programme gave the utmost satisfaction. Mr. Yarwood was assisted by the Orpheus Glee Party, Mr. Councillor Ben Brierley, Mr. Oliver Gaggs, and a lengthy list of vocalists, including Miss Stavart, of the Theatre Royal, all of whom were received with genuine enthusiasm, several of their songs being encored. Mr. C. Fielding presided at the pianoforte.

Mytholmroyd.—On Tuesday the 5th ult. the Sacred Cantata Jonah, composed by Dr. J. V. Roberts, was performed by the members of the Musical Society, with full band and chorus. Mr. L. Fielding was the Conductor.

New York.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their fifth Concert on Saturday evening, the 9th ult. The artists were Miss M. Wilde, soprano, and Mr. R. Hoffman (honorary member), solo pianist. The programme included:—Overture, Schumann (Op. 52); Scena and Aria from Der Freischütz; Beethoven's Concerto in C minor; Liszt's Die Loreley; and Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde." Mr. R. Hoffman was most enthusiastically applauded, and recalled three times after the Concerto. Conductor, Mr. Theodore Thomas.

Norwich.—A Lecture on Music was given during the past month by Mr. Charles E. Noverre, in Mr. Noverre's Rooms, before a large and attentive audience. Mr. Noverre's remarks gave ample evidence of his love for and appreciation of the highest forms of art; and his advocacy of the use of an orchestra as an accompaniment to the musical portion of Divine Service proved his sympathy with the performance of those great works in sacred buildings, which serve more eloquently the cause of religion than can the best sermon ever delivered. The musical illustrations were well selected and efficiently rendered.

Oxford.—The Professor of Music in his terminal Lecture on the 1st ult. discussed the history of Organ Music. It developed in Roman Catholic countries from interludes, amongst reformed nations from the accompaniment of chorals; the former style leading to variety, and the latter to strength of tone. The earliest extant solo organ music was by a Nuremberg musician, the specimen of which performed by Mr. Parratt was extremely grotesque. Far more interesting were the next examples—two preludes by our own countrymen, Bull and O. Gibbons. Yet better was the piece of Frescobaldi, the first musician who adopted modern tonality. The Professor concluded by animadverting on the school of organ building prevalent in France till the end of the last century, which had stops of eight feet only on the pedals, and on the manuals sixteen feet reeds, and so arranged the work that reeds and mixture could not be used together, and by pointing out the immeasurable superiority of J. S. Bach as an organ composer. After the lecture Handel's G minor Concerto was performed.——The Philharmonic Society gave a Concert on the 14th ult. under the conductorship of Mr. Taylor. The principal vocalists were Madame Sophie Löwe, Mr. Austin (of Queen's College), and Mr. Hallewell. The programme consisted of Cherubini's Requiem in C minor, the Overture to Esther, Bach's God's Time is the best, Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer, and Schubert's Song of Miriam. Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer was the best performance, and won an encore. The room was fairly filled with a not very enthusiastic audience.

Peckham.—A highly successful Concert was given by the Peckham Choral Society at St. Mary's National Schools on the 5th ult. The first part of the programme was well selected, and included Spohr's As pants the hart, Mendelssohn's Judge me, O God, Beethoven's "Hallelujah" (Engedi), and several other choral pieces, all of which were excellently sung, under the steady conductorship of Mr. H. Regaldi, whose exertions in training the choir were amply evidenced in this, the first concert of the Society. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection of music. There was a very full attendance.

Plymouth.—On February 27 Mendelssohn's Music to A Midsummer Night's Dream was rendered in a very satisfactory manner by the Plymouth Vocal Association; soloists, Mrs. Osborne Williams and Miss R. Penna. Mr. W. H. R. Wright was the reader, and Mr. Löhr conducted. The second part was miscellaneous.——An order has been given for a grand organ for the Town Hall. The specification is by Dr. Stainer, and the builder is Mr. T. Willis. The cost of the instrument will be over £2,000. The works of the great masters will now be rendered in a complete form, as the organ was the only thing needed, Plymouth possessing a complete orchestra.

Sheffield.—On February 26 an excellent Concert was given at the Albert Hall before a large audience. Mr. Charles Hallé's band occupied the orchestra, and the splendid rendering of the several pieces constituted a rich musical treat. Mr. Hallé conducted with his usual ability, and in his piano solos displayed his customary skill. Madame Patey was the vocalist, and contributed materially to the success of the Concert, being encored in both her songs. Mr. Hallé was recalled after his solos, and the hearty plaudits which followed must have been highly satisfactory to the performer. M. Schallhammer was the accompanist.——Messrs. Peck and Wainwright have during the month continued their series of Saturday Afternoon Concerts at the Albert Hall with fair and well-merited success.——On the 18th ult. the Sheffield Choral Society, after a long interval, gave a Miscellaneous Vocal Concert in the Co-operative Hall in a manner which reflected high credit on the members who, though small in numbers, comprise the leading vocalists of the town. The excellent rendering of the several Glees, Part-songs, and Madrigals, interspersed with Songs and Duets, was most satisfactory, and the applause was warm and well deserved. Mr. J. W. Phillips, Organist of St. George's Church, was the accompanist, and his solo, "Music murmuring thro' the trees," was one of the principal attractions of the evening. Mr. J. C. Walker (Organist of St. Paul's Church, and Conductor of the Society) directed the concert.

Sherborne.—The forty-first Concert of the Sherborne School Musical Society took place on Friday the 1st ult. The programme opened with a Part-song, "The Owl," by Silas, to which the choir did justice. The admirable little school orchestra, led by Mr. C. Regan, and consisting entirely of members of the school, then performed Rossini's Overture to L'Italiana in Algieri excellently, and received much applause. Sparkes, a very promising young pianist, next played Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata," the other instrumental soloists being Messrs. Parker and Marriner (pianoforte), Regan (violin), and Galpin (violoncello). Several vocal pieces were well given, and the concert concluded with "Great Dagon has subdued our foe," from Handel's Samson. The Conductor was Mr. L. N. Parker.

St. Leonards.—A Concert was held in the National Schools on Wednesday, February 27, when Part-Songs, Glees, &c., were given by the choir with great precision. Mr. Stone, of Chesham, sang several songs with artistic feeling, and was enthusiastically applauded. Mrs. Watson presided most efficiently at the piano, and Mr. Blackley at the harmonium.

St. Neots.—On Tuesday, the 19th ult., Haydn's Oratorio, the Creation, was performed in the Corn Exchange. Miss Ada Patterson (soprano), Mr. Greenwood (tenor), and Mr. R. George (bass), all from the Royal Academy, were the principal soloists engaged. The band on this occasion consisted, in the main part, of professionals also. A feature of the evening was the masterly performance of Mr. J. H. Liddle, jun., Mus. Bac., of Windsor, on the violin. The choruses generally were well sustained by members of the Eaton Socon Choral Society, the trebles consisting entirely of lads of that village, who have been very cleverly trained by their talented master, Mr. Liddle, the Organist and Choirmaster of St. Neots' Church. Miss Hobson, who kindly bears the expenses of these entertainments, presided at the pianoforte.

Taunton.—Dr. Bonn, of this town, gave a most interesting Entertainment on Thursday evening, February 28, at the London Hotel Assembly Rooms, on Franz Schubert and the German Volkslied, vocally illustrated. The lecturer sketched the life of the grand song hero, and illustrated his characteristic compositions in a most perfect manner. The pieces selected were enthusiastically received by a highly appreciative audience. Mdlle. Agnes Bonn created quite a furore by her artistic rendering of Mignon's first and second songs, and was rapturously encored. Miss Alice Foy played a Ländler and Rondo from Sonata in A by Schubert, and Mr. G. Abraham conducted.

Uley, Gloucestershire.—The members of the Church Choir, under the direction of Mr. B. W. Leach, Organist of the Parish Church, gave an Entertainment, consisting of vocal and instrumental music and readings, in the Lecture Room on the 4th ult. The programme was fully carried out, and the encores were numerous. The part-songs were well rendered. The members of this Choir presented Mr. Leach, the Conductor, with a handsome paragon suspension lamp, in appreciation of his efforts in providing these musical entertainments, and also as a token of their esteem and respect.

Walthamstow.—In order to aid the Building Fund of Trinity Congregational Church, the Choir, assisted by a few friends, gave on Tuesday evening, the 19th ult., a performance of Haydn's Creation. The church was well filled by a very respectable audience, who thoroughly appreciated the work. The principal singers were Miss Ingram and Messrs. Gillett and Grove, all of whom were highly efficient. The Choruses were exceedingly well sung, especially "The Heavens are telling" and "Achieved is the glorious work." Mr. Goodes conducted with much ability, and Mr. Fountain Meen's playing left nothing to be desired.

Whittington Moor.—Mr. Thomas Cooper, gave his Annual Concert on the 12th ult., in the Assembly Hall. The artists engaged were Miss Burton, Madame George, and Mr. Reeves; solo violin, Mr. Mountney; and Mr. H. N. Biggin, pianist. The programme comprised many favourite pieces, all of which were excellently rendered, including a new song composed for the bénéficiaire, which was received with warm and deserved applause.

Worcester.—The fourth series of Mr. E. J. Spark's Subscription Concerts terminated on the 21st ult., when an excellent programme was provided. The principal vocalists were Miss Annie Sinclair, Madame Osborne Williams, Mr. Pearson, and Mr. Thurley Beale, all of whom were highly successful. The subscribers to these concerts have spoken in the warmest terms of the manner in which all the arrangements have been carried out during the season; and we sincerely hope that Mr. Spark will receive sufficient encouragement to continue musical performances of so attractive a character.

Worsley.—The last Concert of the Choral Society for the present season was given in the Court House on Tuesday the 5th ult. The principal vocalists were Miss Marie Sutton, of Manchester; Miss Harrison, pupil of Mr. Coules; Mr. H. Jates, and Mr. Cunliffe, of the Parish Church Choir, all of whom were deservedly applauded, the two latter gaining an encore. The choir included upwards of forty well-balanced and excellent voices, and the Glees and Part-songs were admirably rendered. Amongst those which deserve special mention were "The Sisters of the Sea" (Jackson) and "St. Agnes' Eve" (Coules). The instrumental pieces were excellently rendered, especially the "Gipsy Trio" (Haydn), by Mr. F. W. Blacow (violin), Mr. C. Blacow (violoncello), and Mr. R. F. Coules, F.C.O. (pianoforte). Mr. W. H. Ellwood, Assistant Organist of the Parish Church, accompanied the Glees. Mr. Coules conducted the choir, accompanied the songs, and played in four instrumental pieces.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. George W. Baker, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's Church, Grove Park, Chiswick.——Mr. H. F. Waller, to St. Paul's Church, St. George's-in-the-East, E.——Mr. T. H. Bunbury, Organist and Director of the Choir to St. Mary's, Hornsey Rise.——Mr. H. Collingwood Banks, R.A.M., Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's, Winchmore Hill.——Mr. M. T. Horton, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church of the Holy Trinity, Ryde.

AUTOMATIC HAND GUIDE

PIANOFORTE

(PATENTED).

It is a fact well-known to all professors of the Pianoforte that one of the chief difficulties encountered by students of this instrument is that of keeping the wrists on a proper level with the keyboard.

Either through carelessness or fatigue the pupil will allow his or her arms to drop too low, or through anxiety will raise them too high; so that this one point will engage a large share of attention which should be given to other matters of equal importance. To correct this tendency, and to assist the pupil, as far as such assistance may be desirable, is the mission of the

BOHRER "AUTOMATIC HAND GUIDE."

Bohrer's Automatic Hand Guide enables the Student of the Pianoforte to attain the most correct touch as well as brilliancy of execution, and to acquire the best style of the Legato and Staccato playing in nearly half the time usually spent with these important branches of the elementary studies. The Hand Guide has received the highest testimonials from the leading Pianists and Professors of Music, and is introduced into the principal Conservatories, Academies, and Schools both in England and the Continent.

From the Illustrated London News, Saturday, 16th Feb., 1878:—"Under this general title the eminent publishing firm of Ricordi, of Milan, Rome, Naples, Florence, and London, is issuing a series of classical works, at prices which are surprisingly low, even in these days of cheapness. The earliest four numbers of the series comprise a selection of the compositions of Bach; and, more recently, the first of six numbers has been issued, all of which are to consist of works by Muzio-Clementi, the father of the modern art of pianoforte playing. This great man was Italian by birth, and the publication now referred to is an appropriate tribute rendered by the greatest music-publishing firm of that country. The first number contains the easier pieces—sonatinas, preludes, exercises, and waltzes; and these are to be followed by a selection from the 'Gradus ad Parnassum,' and the most important of the sonatas. The work is well engraved and printed (in quarto form), and ninety-six pages are given for eighteen pence."

"Danze Celebri" (Celebrated Dances) is a cheap collection, similar in form to the above-named publication, of the best pieces of the several members of the Strauss family, all celebrated for their dance music. This is also published by Ricordi.

"Clementi," Vol. I., II., III., IV., 1s. 6d. net. Bach. Vol. I., II., III., 1s. 6d. each net.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.'S

MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

A DICTIONARY OF MUSICAL TERMS

EDITED BY

J. STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc.,
Magd. Coll., Oxford,
AND
W. A. BARRETT, Mus. Bac.,
St. Mary Hall, Oxford.

The following Gentlemen have contributed to this Work:—

Bosanquet, R. H. M., Esq., M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford.
Bulley, J., Esq., M.A., Magdalen College, Oxford.
Champneys, F., Esq., B.M., M.A., M.R.C.S., of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, late Radcliffe Travelling Fellow of the University of Oxford.
Chappell, W., Esq., F.S.A.
Donkin, A. E., Esq., M.A., F.R.A.S., Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford.
Ellis, A. J., Esq., B.A., F.R.S., F.S.A., F.C.P.S., F.C.P., Trinity College, Cambridge.
Gadsby, Henry, Esq.
Helmore, Rev. T., M.A.
Hullah, John, Esq.
McNaught, W. G., Esq.
Monk, W. H., Esq.

"Among articles which, though not absolutely indispensable in a Musical Dictionary, are well worth reading as treated in the Dictionary edited by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, may be mentioned 'applause' and 'dedication.' Indeed, apart from its high value as a work of reference, the Dictionary is interesting throughout."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett, comes to supply the deficiency just at the time when people are waking up to the advantages of accuracy in all sorts of arts, and it is most welcome. Its title gives a very humble idea of its importance, suggesting rather dry definitions or technical explanations than what it really contains. The definitions and explanations are all there, and their multitude is truly astonishing, even the most out-of-the-way words receiving consideration; but besides this there is a great quantity of valuable essays, not only by the editors, but also by men well known to the public for successful labours in the field of music and acoustics, such as Mr. Hullah and Mr. Ellis, the translator of Helmholtz, and Mr. William Chappell and Mr. Helmore."—The Academy.

"A 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' by Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett (Novello, Ewer and Co.), deserves especial mention, as the first attempt to supply the English reader with something that is not a limited glossary of technical words, but an encyclopædic book of reference on matters musical, such as German and Italian students have for some time been fortunate enough to possess."—The Graphic.

"In addition to this, the editors have derived information from many other equally good sources, so that the work is as trustworthy as it is complete, and professional and amateur musicians will alike owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Stainer and Mr. Barrett for one of the most useful musical works ever produced."—Standard.

"It is the general character and tone of the volume that concerns general amateurs, who, at a little cost of time, can obtain from this volume information on theoretical and scientific subjects, without having to wade through complex works. The Dictionary displays careful research generally, and it is also imbued with an impartial spirit, which goes far to beget confidence in the writers. The book is illustrated with diagrams of instrumental workmanship, and is printed in very large and clear type."—The Athenæum.

Avenging and bright.	Oh, tis sweet to think.
Believe me, if all those.	Oh, where's the slave.
Eveleen's bower.	Silent, O Moyle.
Go where glory waits thee.	The last rose of summer.
Has sorrow thy young days.	The young May moon.
Meeting of the waters.	'Tis gone, and for ever.
Nay, tell me not, dear.	What the bee is to the flow'ret.
Oh, blame not the bard.	When thro' life.
Oh, breathe not his name.	When cold in the earth.
Oh, doubt me not.	Wreathe the bowl.

A NEW WORK FOR THE ORGAN.

J. LEYBACH'S L'ORGANISTE PRATIQUE

120 MORCEAUX FACILES POUR HARMONIUM OU ORGUE.

In two Vols., each 6s. net; or eight parts, each 2s. net.

CHAPPELL'S PENNY OPERATIC PART-SONGS.

For Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass.

The present collection of Part-Songs is entirely new, being selected and adapted from the most striking and popular Choruses in the Favourite Foreign Operas. The Arrangement is purely Vocal, such Choruses only being chosen as can be sung without the aid of an Instrumental Accompaniment. The Words have been expressly written for the work, and the harmonies arranged in four parts, as likely to be most useful in small classes.

1.	Hymn of the Fisherman's Children	Adapted to a Melody from Herold's "Zampa."
2.	Fays and Elves (In mia fe)	From Flotow's "Marta."
3.	Spring's Bright Glances (In Elvezia non v' ha)	From Bellini's "La Sonnambula."
4.	From Yonder Vale and Hill (D' immenso giubilo)	From Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor."
5.	Here we Rest (Qui la selva)	From Bellini's "La Sonnambula."
6.	Onward to Battle (Squilli echeggi)	From Verdi's "Il Trovatore."
7.	Rataplan (Rataplan)	From Donizetti's "La Figlia del Reggimento."
8.	The Gipsy's Star (Vedi! le fosche)	From Verdi's "Il Trovatore."
9.	War Song of the Druids (Dell' aura tua profetica)	From Bellini's "Norma."
10.	In Mercy, hear us! (Ciclo clemente)	From Donizetti's "La Figlia del Reggimento."

20, OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

ESTABLISHED 1804.

PRIZE MEDAL, LONDON, 1862. | GOLD MEDAL, SOUTH AFRICA, 1877.

The only Firm who obtained the International Exhibition Medal for the special distinction of "excellence of touch and tone."

FROM 29 GUINEAS.

"The Pianettes manufactured by CHALLEN & SON are most satisfactory instruments."—Anton Rubinstein.

"I can testify in the strongest manner to the qualities of the Pianette as manufactured by CHALLEN & SON. In every point, as to tone and touch, they are excellent; and I can also certify from experience as to their durability under hard wear."—William Henry Monk, Professor of Music in King's College, London.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL SEMI-COTTAGE,

WITH CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 32 GUINEAS.

"The Pianos I have selected from Messrs. CHALLEN & SON have invariably given complete satisfaction, some of them having had to bear the severe test of an Indian climate."—William H. Cummings.

"As a customer of some years' standing, I speak with confidence of the quality of the instruments supplied by Messrs. CHALLEN & SON. The two I have for my own use have had a great deal of wear, and in this respect have entirely satisfied me as to their durability; and the tone and touch of all those selected by me for myself or pupils have been much commended."—Alfred Gilbert, R.A.M.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL COTTAGE;

TRICHORD THROUGHOUT; BRASS BRIDGE; CHECK REPEATER ACTION.

FROM 60 GUINEAS.

"I hold a very high opinion of Messrs. CHALLEN & SON'S Pianos. Their qualities of tone and touch can be at once estimated; but I can furthermore bear testimony to their great durability."—Lindsay Sloper.

"CHALLEN & SON is a name synonymous with wonderful durability, great beauty of tone, and moderation in price. We know of not one single maker whose Pianos excel theirs in the qualities most desirable in a good and lasting Piano."—Cape Argus, May 7.

EXCELLENCE IS GUARANTEED, AND EVERY INSTRUMENT WARRANTED TO BE OF THE HIGHEST CLASS WORKMANSHIP AND MATERIALS.

VIOLIN AND HARP STRINGS.
BEST QUALITIES ONLY.
Hart and Son, Violin Makers and Restorers, 14, Princes Street, Leicester Square, London.

ALFRED FERDINAND RIPPON (Grand-nephew of the great Dr. John Rippon), VIOLIN, BASS, and BOW MAKER, Musical Instrument Warehouse, London Street, Reading. The above artist is a Professor of Music, a Composer, and also a fine Violinist, and having been brought up a maker in addition to a performer, in his father's workshop, is making very handsome Violins, covered with splendid varnish, possessing all the chaste, refined, and esteemed qualities of the great Italian masters' productions, and pronounced by the best judges to be far superior to all others manufactured since. Price from ten guineas each. Most perfect Bows (own make), exquisitely finished, from the choicest woods, real silver mounted, from three guineas; gold mounted, from five guineas. Violins, &c., skilfully restored, improved, accurately adjusted, regulated, and perfected, thereby insuring the admiration of all true artists.

TO VIOLINISTS.—COOKE'S NEW PATENT MACHINE PEG for the VIOLIN affords most important advantages. By this invention the tension of the violin strings is regulated by a machine screw (e.g. the contra-bass), the Peg at the same time retaining the action of the ordinary peg. Easily adjusted without injury to instrument. Will prove a great boon to violin-players. Price each Peg, Five Shillings (net). Agent, Lafleur and Son, 15, Green Street, Leicester Square, London.

WARD'S
FOR PROVIDING A CENTRAL & DIRECT LIGHT FOR THE PERFORMER.
The inconvenience of the present mode of lighting a performer at a pianoforte or harmonium by means of sconces fitted at the extremities of the instrument has long been a subject of complaint. The requirement is a central light to fall direct upon the music-book. This can be obtained by using Thomas Ward's Royal Pianoforte Lamp, which can be fitted to any form of instrument without defacing the same. Vocalists also will thus find a convenience which does not exist in other modes of lighting.
Prospectuses post-free.

"Barrow Street, Quorndon, near Loughborough,
"July 16, 1877.
"Sir,—It is now over two years since I purchased a set of your pedals and action for pianofortes. After having thoroughly tested them and used them regularly for so long a period I have no hesitation in saying that they are a most decided success, and at the same time advise every organ student who wishes to become proficient in the art of pedalling to procure a set of them at once.
"I remain, Sir, yours truly,
"To Mr. J. Hamilton." "J. J. CALLIS."

NATIONAL MUSICAL EDUCATION.

By H. H. STATHAM.

THE trio of worthies who played such a merciless practical joke on Malvolio—Sir Andrew Aguecheek, Sir Toby Belch, and the nameless "Clown"—were certainly not, even for the times in which they lived, very erudite or refined people. But it appears from the story that they could do what very few English people in the best society can do now, among those at least who are not specially and professedly "musical people"—they could sing a part-song without accompaniment, and that not as a set task, but as an after-dinner relaxation and enjoyment. Indeed it was the want of appreciation of their music on the part of the respectable steward which gave rise to the unhappy breach between him and them. We might be doubtful about the musical powers of the two knights, perhaps, if we did not know from other parts of the play that the Clown, who was no fool except professionally, was possessed of eminent musical gifts, since in another scene he is specially summoned to sing the Duke's favourite song, as the only person who could do it justice. It is not likely, therefore, that he would have joined with the "gentlemen" in a part-song unless they had been able to do their part with commendable ability; and, indeed, he makes a point of defending the performance to Malvolio as correct musically, if not morally: "We did keep time, sir, in our catches." We are not of course without other and more direct historical evidence of the prevalence of part-singing as a branch of home music in the Elizabethan period; but this musical revelry in Sir Toby's quarters is a specially strong instance, because it was a case of after-dinner, or after-supper, singing, and it seems that even under such circumstances artistic conditions were observed.

With all the performances of modern music on a grand scale in England, all the undoubted love of the art and the still greater amount of talk about it, we do not find now that knowledge of music and habitual practice of it which would be indicated by the fact of a general ability to join in harmonised vocal compositions, of even a simple character, as a matter of social recreation. It may be said that pianoforte-playing and solo-singing have taken the place of this kind of music, and that the pianoforte pieces and songs heard at average social gatherings are for the most part music of more artistic form, or at all events of more poetic and imaginative feeling, than the part-songs with "burdens" which our ancestors sung. There may be two sides even to that latter part of the comparison; but what is to the point at present is that the moderate ability in playing and singing found among average English ladies and gentlemen in the present day does not in itself presuppose any real scholarly knowledge of the art of music. Those of us who pay any attention to such matters know very well that the lady who plays a piece fairly generally does not know what key it is in, and that any mistakes which she may make are usually not those of accident or want of manipulative power, but of sheer ignorance of musical form or utter insensibility to style. We know that the gentleman with a good voice who sings a song with considerable effect has probably learned it mainly from getting the melody played along with him on the piano till his ear has caught it, and we possibly find him out by his suddenly making a mistake in an interval or in the form of a phrase, in such a way as to prove that he has no perception of the tonal relation of the sounds which form the melody: so that the mere amount of playing and singing which goes on is not much test of musical knowledge. If we compare the kind of performance in the present day which comes nearest to that of our "Twelfth-Night" trio, the after-dinner singing on convivial occasions, we find the deeps of musical inability among modern Englishmen laid bare before us. On State occasions, indeed, we are wise enough not to attempt what we cannot do. Sir Toby Belch and his two companions could have sung "Non nobis Domine" themselves, if they had been disposed for anything so serious: we engage certain trustworthy professional gentlemen to sing it for us, and to put in the more or less appropriate singing between the toasts. Considerations of conventional dignity and reserve would perhaps, in modern times, stand in the way of singing by the guests, in any case, at a gathering of a ceremonial description. But when, on occasions of less ceremonious conviviality, singing by the guests is introduced, then we become conscious what the engagement of the professional singers at a more formal entertainment delivers us from. When the chairman "calls on Mr. —— for a song," we know that we may expect to hear the words half recited in a kind of irregular sing-song, embodying a vague suggestion of the outlines of a melody. Or if by good luck the gentleman called upon is able to sing the melody truly, we at all events know that when the chairman suggests that the guests will join in the chorus, he merely means that the company will all shout simultaneously something as near the supposed melody as they are able to get, each at the pitch which happens to suit his own voice. One or two will perhaps please themselves with the notion that they are "singing the bass" by following the melody till the last three notes, when they will diverge to a—

that simple formula of dropping from the fifth to the key-note at the close being the average Englishman's ruling idea about the "bass." If we go to a church where the congregation endeavours to join in the singing, the result is pretty much the same. Our friend with the bass is always to be met with there, but even he is in a minority; and the probability is that a worshipper behind us, possessed of a deep voice, is singing the melody of the tune two octaves lower than it was written, and of course beneath the real bass as sung by the choir. Hymn-books are now provided giving the music as well as the words; but the ability and even the wish to make use of these in realising harmonised singing seems to be still wanted, and the few who possess it find themselves in too small a minority to diverge from the universal practice. A lady with a contralto voice told the writer one day how she had attempted to put the hymn-book with music to its proper use by singing the part in the harmony suited to her own voice; "but," she said, "I found my children, who used to join in the hymns, looked up at me in a puzzled manner and stopped singing, and my neighbours in the congregation looked round at me with a disapproving expression, as if they thought I was doing something wrong; so I had to give it up again." It would have been, perhaps, a better course if the lady in such a case, instead of "giving in," had endeavoured to teach her children, or get them taught, sufficient about part-singing and reading music to understand the rationale of the matter. But it perhaps is hardly surprising that what is almost ignored in public education in this country should not fare better in private.

It is, in fact, the want of any proper system of musical education in our schools which is probably the most serious obstacle to music taking the place among English people which, though in a far more primitive stage of the art, it obviously did at one time take. There is the fact, of which we can have no doubt from the evidence that remains to us, that 300 years ago music was a part of the usual training and education of English boys and girls, and that it was almost a matter of course that any one of good education, if he had a voice and a power of singing, was able to bear a part with others in harmonised singing, both with the spirit and the understanding. It is not only not a matter of course now that any should have the slightest degree of musical education, but it is also a significant fact that many of those who have some musical accomplishments, and who are habitually asked to sing and play by their friends, have acquired these accomplishments in a kind of left-handed manner, and with no real and solid basis of knowledge as a groundwork on which to exhibit their natural ability. But the establishment of a generally satisfactory standard of musical knowledge is really almost a matter of more importance than the training of specially gifted persons for the profession of music. These latter are almost always led by exceptional ability and strong predilection to turn to music as the work of their life, and such persons are pretty sure to get education somewhere; and it is even an open question, upon which doctors of considerable eminence have differed, whether academical training really has any very beneficial or developing influence on musical genius, and whether the connection with this or that educational establishment has not in most cases shed lustre upon the establishment itself, rather than upon the genius who would have been successful equally without it. There is, however, another side to this question, to which we may devote a word or two just now. But of the importance of a general, good, and systematic education in music, as the means of developing the average of musical ability and the power of finding intellectual enjoyment in the art, and of rendering the English once more, in real truth, a musical people, there can be no doubt; and it is here that reform is most urgently needed.

Now it can hardly be said that in the great impulse which has been given of late years to systematic primary education under Government sanction the subject of music has been intentionally overlooked. The Government has so far shown a wish to recognise the importance of musical training in elementary schools as to institute a special little endowment to schools of so much per head per annum for every child who can afford evidence of having been taught music. The grant is a very little one in each case—it might be said absurdly little—being only a shilling per child; but, in the aggregate, the money thus expended amounts to nearly £100,000 per annum. That, when we take it en masse, is a good deal of money to spend, though nothing that should for a moment be grudged if the desired result were attained by it. But it is a very great deal of money to throw away, and it is getting absolutely and completely thrown away. We might even go further, and say that it is used so as to produce positive evil. For the capitation grant is obtained in this way: The Government Inspector for the district in which a school is situated hears certain children sing some songs, and, if he is satisfied, the grant is given. The Inspector will in all probability not be in any sense a musical man. It is a curious fact that the upper class of schoolmasters and persons officially connected with education very seldom are musical, in this country at least. It is ten to one that he does not really know the least whether the children sing in tune or not; and therefore, even if they were taught on a good system, he would be no judge of the results. But the fact is that the children are not taught music at all; they are simply made to repeat certain melodies after the teacher, with or without the help of an instrument, until they can more or less sing them, much as a parrot can imitate musical sounds which are made in its hearing. Now we call this method worse than useless, because it not only does no good itself, but it stops the way against real learning of music. It does not enable the pupil to take a single step alone: the learning of ninety-nine melodies by ear does nothing towards enabling the pupil to read the hundredth, or to know anything about the relation of musical sounds, even in the most elementary manner; but it creates and fosters a mistaken idea that something has been learned, for which a certain credit is given which is utterly undeserved by either teacher or pupil. The so-called teacher may know little more about the matter than the pupils; at any rate it is of no consequence in one sense whether he does or not, since he can earn the shillings for his school without any real musical knowledge.

As a matter of fact, however, it would seem from Mr. Hullah's reports of his examinations of some forty training establishments for teachers in England, Wales, and Scotland, that there is, even at present, a very fair amount of musical knowledge, and probably ability to communicate that knowledge to others, among those who become masters and mistresses in our elementary schools. It was in 1872 that Mr. Hullah was appointed to the important and rather arduous post of musical examiner of the students of the training colleges, and he testifies that since even that recent period the advance has been very great. In his report for 1876 he says: "Of every student who, prior to 1872, left a training college in which he had remained two years, it may be said that he left it possessed of some musical skill and science, in many instances, as I know, of very considerable. A very large number of acting teachers not educated in training colleges were, as I have also reason to know, fair musicians before they entered their profession, and a still larger number have become such since they have done so." He therefore concludes that there is a considerable proportion of masters and mistresses of schools receiving Government grants who would be quite competent to teach children to sing from note. But this amount of musical accomplishment, Mr. Hullah complains, has not really been brought to bear on the elementary schools. We quote again from his report for 1876:—

> Every class of the community has directly or indirectly profited by the impulse given to musical instruction by my Lords in 1840—1., except that particular class which it was hoped and believed would profit most largely from it. Indeed, what has been latterly done for music in schools has rather impeded than furthered its improvement. The "songs" for the last few years required of scholars are not merely worthless as means of musical culture, but they take up time that might be given to the real study of the subject, and thus, so I have been repeatedly told by schoolmasters whom I know to be competent to teach, prevent their turning their knowledge to account in teaching their pupils, not half-a-dozen songs, but—music.
> Music is the single subject in which our future school-teachers are prepared at a considerable expenditure of time and money, the results of the teaching of which are neither ascertained with any precision nor recorded.
> In elementary schools, perhaps in all schools, teaching and examination act and re-act upon each other. As that which is not taught cannot be examined in, so that which it is known will not be examined in is not likely to be taught.

And thus it comes to pass that the children are bored with being taught music in a way that cannot enable them to turn it to any good account subsequently in giving pleasure either to themselves or others. No one, perhaps, is more in a position to appreciate the result than the unfortunate organist of a country church, who is assured that the boys who form his trebles and altos are taught music in school, and finds that this only means that they can pick up a new chant after it has been drummed over to them a dozen times—the trebles can, that is to say; the altos (if any of the boys are promoted to singing alto) probably never get their part, because they are dependent on hearing it from the instrument. The remedy for this state of things is, as Mr. Hullah suggests, that the children should be examined, not in singing, but in music. For this purpose he would advise, we believe, that persons competent to examine them in music should be placed at the disposal of the School Inspectors. He suggests that there are men to be found in every district who would be able to perform this duty efficiently in regard to an elementary school, without going to the expense in fees which the appointment of a professional musician of a high class to each district would entail. In the neighbourhood of a cathedral town, for example, there is sure to be found some member of the cathedral choir whose services could be secured for such a task; and he assumes that there would be no real difficulty in finding persons similarly qualified in other districts, whose assistance could be secured without any unreasonable or exorbitant demand on public money. That this would be found so we have very little doubt, and that this would be the best immediate way of meeting the case, and ensuring that real musical instruction, instead of mere parrot-teaching, should be a necessary condition of a school receiving the capitation grant for music; and we wish to join to the repeated representations of Mr. Hullah to his official chiefs our own strong recommendation that some such steps should be taken without any delay, as the best means of immediately securing the adequate musical inspection of elementary schools.

We say, however, advisedly, the best way of "immediately" securing this. For does not the very suggestion, and the fact that it should be necessary, lead to the reflection how very much better it would be if the Government Inspector himself were competent to examine the children musically, and what a really extraordinary oversight it is that, music being one of the subjects to be examined in, the possession of some knowledge of it on the part of the Government Inspector should not be a necessary condition of qualification for the office? This consideration naturally brings us to the next step in the subject—the necessity of musical education in schools of a higher grade, and which are frequented by pupils in a different class of life from those who occupy the elementary schools under Government inspection. Why is it to be the case that music is to be looked upon as a kind of exceptional thing, which an "educated man" is not supposed to know anything about necessarily? The common supposition, that only a comparatively few persons have any aptitude for knowing or understanding anything about it, is only the natural consequence of the fact that hardly any systematic attempt is made to teach them. The idea is probably an entire delusion. If some education in the elements of music were made as regular a part of education as English Composition and Latin Grammar, there is no reason to suppose that there would be any greater proportion of dunces in the Musical Class than in the others. Those who learned music might not all grow up with "voices," or with the ability to sing or play, but they would at least have a ground-work of knowledge which would enable them to form a sound judgment on the subject; to listen to music with the understanding as well as with the spirit; and to have some logical basis of opinion which would probably do much to put an end to those absurd flights of fashion for this or that novelty in music which are usually supported by persons of general, but not of musical education. But even the very fact of the ability to do something practically with music—the possession of what is called "ear"—is very much more a matter of education than is commonly supposed; and many who imagine they have no ear, and that they "cannot tell one tune from another," would have found themselves with quite an average ability in this respect if their attention had been directed in childhood to the scientific basis of music, the relations of tones, and the elements of musical form (if such a thing is now any longer to be permitted to exist!). With the teaching of music as a necessary element of education in our schools would naturally come its introduction as a specific part of university study; leaving, of course, untouched the present university rewards for exceptional attainments in music, but making the possession of a certain degree of general knowledge of the art a recognised portion of a liberal education. There is no possible reason why this should not be done, except the fact that it never has been, and the natural result that a knowledge of music is therefore supposed to be the privilege of a few, simply because the many have never had the encouragement or the opportunity to obtain it. We must aim at getting rid of this view of music as an exceptional thing — recognise it as a great language, with its classic literature, as important to our intellectual completeness as Greek or French, and a knowledge of which may be just as well acquired by any one who will take the trouble. Then, and not till then, we shall be really a musical nation; we shall no longer see music regarded with a jealous eye by schoolmasters as an infringement on the claims of languages and mathematics; and we shall not be obliged to contemplate the necessity of engaging supplementary assistants to examine into the music of primary schools because our highly educated gentleman, the Government Inspector, is so utterly unacquainted with the rudiments of the art that his judgment on the matter is worth nothing.

Such a general recognition of music as an integral part of a liberal education seems the most important reform that could be aimed at in musical education in this country, for the lift in the taste and knowledge of the public at large would be sure to have its influence on the standard of professional education, directly or indirectly. In regard to this last and highly important subject of facilities for professional or high-class musical education, it may be said that we are most probably in a fair way to put an end to the reproach that was till lately to be made against us of having no national Conservatoire. It is true that the condition of things in this respect is at present rather that of promise than of results: we can hardly judge yet what the National Training-School for Music will really turn out. But we have at least the commencement of an educational institution for music which possesses three most important qualifications: it provides free education, a matter the more important since (for what reason one can hardly understand) exceptional ability for music is much more often found among the poorer than among the richer classes of English society; it makes natural ability in music a condition of entrance; and it provides an obligatory course of study, though perhaps hardly so full or so precisely defined as might be desired; and it may perhaps be considered, in accordance with some of the evidence given before the Society of Arts' Committee in 1866, that thorough efficiency in the working of such an institution is best secured by the appointment of a principal who would be able and desirous to concentrate his whole attention upon it, rather than of one whose reputation and occupations would hardly allow him to do this. There seems, however, every reason to believe that the instruction of the scholars in the general curriculum and in their various special branches is very well provided for and very systematically carried on, and that we may look with hope to the future results of the establishment at Kensington. The demand for admission is very large, it appears—far beyond what the existing endowments of the school will meet; and this is a point that may well be brought before those who have the means and the wish to do something to promote the improvement of musical education. Among those who take an interest in music, in London alone, there is wealth enough to provide at once for a large addition to the number of endowed scholarships, and such an employment of a certain amount of capital would be an exceedingly efficacious method of giving a practical turn to that enthusiastic interest in music which has become so prevalent of late years in English society.

By William H. Cummings.

The pretended discovery by Mr. Thomas Hunter of "The King's Anthem, Dr. Bull" was readily believed in by some, although there were others who doubted its genuineness. The MS. was sent to Richard Clark for his inspection, and on the 13th of February, 1840, he published another long letter re-asserting all his previous statements respecting Bull, Ben Jonson, and the Merchant Taylors' Company, closing with the following cautious paragraph:—

If the MS. (sent by Mr. Hunter), headed "The King's Anthem, Dr. Bull," which has been forwarded to me for my inspection be genuine, it is a further confirmation of what I have already stated of Dr. Bull. By the watermark in the sheet of music-paper containing the tune in question, the paper was made by P. Ballard about 1687, of which make I have much in my possession. If this said MS. be not genuine (which I much suspect) we shall learn something more respecting it anon.

It appears that the MS. was shown to Sir Francis Madden, the Keeper of the Manuscripts in the British Museum, and he expressed his opinion that it was "undoubtedly a forgery, written within these twenty years, and that the paper was anterior to the time."

I should not have referred to the letters of James Henry Saville and Thomas Hunter had I not feared that some enthusiastic student might hereafter discover and reproduce them as veritable facts. In order to prevent any such use being made of them, I am able to state that they were both the concoction of Mr. Joseph Warren, a well-known and most accomplished musician and antiquary. Originally intended as an amusing hoax they doubtless added to the mystery and confusion which surrounded the subject of the authorship of "God save the King." Mr. Warren subsequently endeavoured to make amends by informing Mr. Richard Clark of the true state of the case; but, so far as I know, the latter never publicly referred to the matter. I am kindly permitted by Mr. Warren to publish the following letter, the original of which is now lying before me:—

Litlington Tower,
Cloisters, Westminster, Feb. 12, 1846.

Dear Sir,—When you were at my house looking through my own book with the accounts of persons in the Musical World on the long-disputed subject of "God save the King," you mentioned various funny circumstances which had been pursued by yourself, Dr. Rimbault, Mr. Chapelle, and Mr. Davidson, only for the purpose of bringing out before the public all that could possibly be written on that subject; you stated also that whilst you were at the Museum one day you concocted the piece of music said to have been found at a cheesemonger's shop, Islington; this was taken by Mr. Chapelle to (I forgot who)—he pronounced the same a forgery; all this you wished me to transcribe in my own book, stating that you had authorised me to do so. Now you will oblige me by drawing up the above particulars and put the same in the post, because there were several other amusing facts which I do not recollect. I should like to place yours to me on the subject besides Dr. Rimbault's, Mr. Nichol's, and Mr. Chapelle's.
Your early reply will oblige, Dear Sir, yours truly,
To Joseph Warren, Esq. Richd. Clark.

Mr. Warren tells me he adopted the nom de plume of Saville, thinking of Saville House, Leicester Square, and that Hunter is one of his family names.

The controversy respecting the authorship of "God save the King" was in this unsatisfactory state when Dr. Kitchener died (1840), and he left "particular injunctions respecting the non-disposal of a certain MS. music-book"—the volume containing Bull's compositions,—and consequently this book was not included in the sale of the doctor's library. But it was subsequently sold privately to Mr. Clark for £20, who shortly afterwards announced it to be a "Collection of Pieces for the Virginals in the veritable autograph of Dr. John Bull," which he had carefully gone through, and "found that precisely at the bar where Dr. Kitchener's published extract concludes, the correct melody of the National Anthem begins." Here again Clark made two foolish blunders, for we shall presently find that the MS. could not by any possibility have been in Bull's autograph, and a reference to the index previously published (p. 196) fully proves that the "God save the King" which Kitchener had quoted was followed by several pieces bearing neither reference nor resemblance to the air we call the National Anthem. In November, 1841, Clark addressed a printed circular to the "Masters, Wardens," &c., of the City Companies, in which he says:—

I continued my inquiries until eventually I was enabled to obtain a sight of, and finally to purchase (in the handwriting of the composer (Dr. John Bull), this long-lost manuscript.

That the manuscript was not in the composer's own hand may be ascertained by reference to the list and indices of the Bull volumes, published in Ward's "Lives of the Gresham Professors," where the name of the *Flemish scribe is quoted as part of the "Large quarto, number 16 in the Catalogue." At the end of this book is written the following note: "Incepit 6 Apr. 1628, finivit 20 Oct. 1628. Scribebat Gulielmus a Messaus, Divat Walburgis Antverpiensis phonascus." These dates are an additional proof that the writings were not in the autograph of Dr. Bull, for he died on the 12th or 13th of March, 1628, and was buried in the Church of Notre Dame, in Antwerp. I have already mentioned the fact that I have recently examined one of the Bull volumes—that which is described is on p. 206 of Ward's "Lives," &c.—and I am therefore able confidently to assert that it is also in the hand of a Flemish scribe, and further that several of the pieces bear dates showing that they were copied after Bull was dead and buried. In 1860 Sir Francis Madden examined the particular volume which had belonged to Kitchener and Clark, the one in which all our interest is now centred, and he wrote respecting the contents: "Of course they cannot be in the handwriting of Dr. John Bull, but of some Dutchman." We may therefore, I think, very fairly assume that all the Bull MSS. spoken of by Ward were copies made by the same Flemish scribe.

It is singular that after having published so many untenable statements respecting "God save the King" Clark should have really discovered in his recent purchase an "Ayre" bearing a remarkable resemblance to the true melody;—that the resemblance was very apparent may be gathered from the writings of Dr. Rimbault,* Dr. Gauntlett, Sir George Smart, and Mr. W. Chappell. The last gentleman, a thoroughly competent and impartial judge, has recorded his opinion in "Popular Music of the Olden Time." He says:—

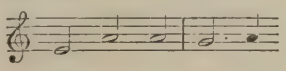
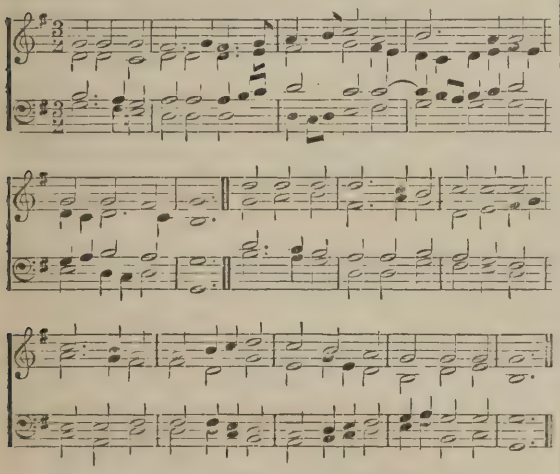
It is a curious fact (of which Clark could not have been aware when he published his account) that an "Ayre" at p. 98 of the manuscript is very like our "God save the King." The piece which is therein entitled "God save the King" is at p. 66, and the same which Kitchener published. When Clark played the "Ayre" to me, with the book before him, I thought it to be the original of the National Anthem; but afterwards, taking the manuscript into my own hands, I was convinced that it had been tampered with and the resemblance strengthened, the sharps being in ink of a much darker colour than other The additions are very perceptible, in spite of Clark's having covered the face of that portion with varnish. In its original state the 'Ayre' commenced with these notes:—



The G being natural, the resemblance to "God save the King" does not strike the ear, but by making the G sharp, and changing the whole from an old scale without sharps or flats into the modern scale of A major (three sharps), the tune becomes essentially like "God save the King." When I reflected further upon the matter, it appeared very improbable that Dr. Bull should have composed a piece for the organ in the modern key of A major. The most curious part of the resemblance between Dr. Bull's "Ayre" and "God save the King" is that the first phrase consists of six bars and the second of eight, which similarity does not exist in any other of the airs from which it is supposed to have been taken. It is true that the eight bars of the second phrase are made out by holding on the final notes of the melody through two bars, therefore it differs decidedly from all copies of our modern tune: but the words may be sung to Bull's "Ayre" by dividing the time of the long notes—in fact, it has been so performed in public, before the late King of Hanover, at the Concerts of Ancient Music and at other public concerts. The late R. Clark lent the voice-parts, which had been used on these occasions, to Dr. Rimbault for performance at his Lectures on Music in Liverpool. Dr. Rimbault copied them in score for his own use, and has favoured me with the following transcript:—

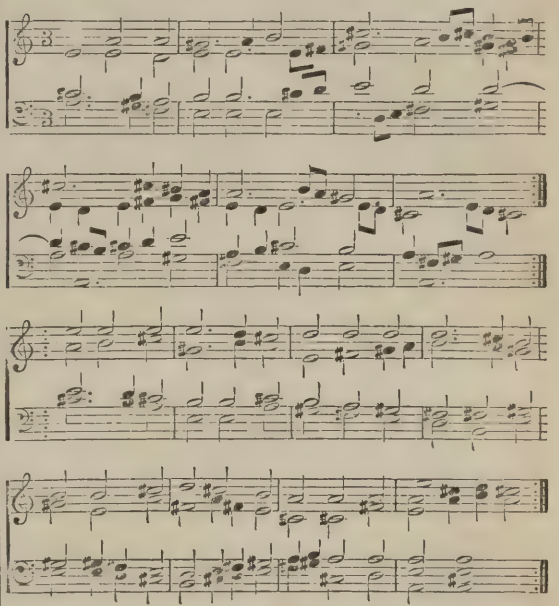


From what I have said above it will be understood that in this copy the "Ayre" has been transposed and changed into the key of G major. The first note of the tune should (in this key) be D, and instead of four G's at the end, the first G in the thirteenth bar should be held through that and the fourteenth to the termination of the tune. I have other doubts about the accuracy of the copy, but cannot resolve them from memory, and the permission to compare it with the original has been refused.

Unfortunately the book containing Bull's "Ayre" has disappeared, and whether it will ever again see the light is somewhat doubtful; but I am enabled in some measure to supply a tolerably sufficient substitute. In my library is a volume of miscellaneous music from the collection of Sir George Smart; its contents are oddly thrown together—Mendelssohn's "Te Deum" and a condensed conductor's copy of "Der Freischütz," Goss's "Chants," and "The soldier's dream" follow each other in happy disregard of order or appropriateness,—and in the midst of these things is a single leaf of manuscript in the autograph of Sir George mart. It is headed thus:—

Copied from Dr. Bull's MS. Book, about which so much has been written, now in the possession of R. Clark.—G. Smart. (Page 98.)*

GOD SAVE THE KING.



(Two more verses.)

I would invite a careful comparison of the "Ayre," as faithfully copied for his own private use by Sir George Smart, and of that which was doctored up for the hearing of the late King of Hanover. Doubtless the persistent endeavours to make up strong evidence in favour of Bull engendered suspicion and must be considered most reprehensible. It is, moreover, probable that Mr. Chappell is correct in his surmise that Bull's "Ayre" had originally few or no sharps. These were inserted or suggested I suspect by some better musician than Clark, and as in the original index the piece is called an "Air," the words "God save the King" were probably added at the same time. The like must be said of the words "2 more verses"—a very suspicious addition.

Allowing for all the insertions of "sharps," "title," "2 more verses," &c., I cannot but think that whether read in the minor or major mode we have the first suggestion of the music afterwards adapted for our National Anthem. There is the framework, rhythm, and melody. Mr. Chappell has remarked on the singular coincidence of form, six bars in the first part and eight bars in the second part of the tunes. The mode is really of but little importance; in the days when variations on popular airs were in vogue, almost every composer, from Beethoven downward, exercised his ingenuity on "God save the King," and seldom failed to put one variation in the minor key.

In April, 1860, Sir Francis Madden sent a letter to Mr. Chappell, from which I extract the following:—

The MS. formerly belonging to Mr. Richard Clark, and which you have mentioned at some length in your work, has been offered to me for purchase. I have looked at it again carefully, and am of opinion (as I formerly was) that the lower part of p. 98 is in a much later hand than the rest of the volume, and also that the pretended reference to p. 98 on another page is a recent addition to the original flourish.

Sir Francis Madden here speaks of a "pretended reference to p. 98 on another page." It is just possible

* Dr. Rimbault has recently been quoted as a determined opponent to the authorship of Bull. He doubtless was so up to 1841, but on examining the "Ayre" he changed his opinion, and in 1855 published a short account of the National Anthem, in which he strongly expressed his belief that Dr. Bull composed "God save the King."

* This ought to have been "folio," not "page," 98.

this may have been added when the programme of Bull's music for performance before the King of Hanover was in preparation.

The sixth number in that programme consisted of (1) the Prelude, or Introduction to the National Anthem for the organ, with an obbligato trumpet accompaniment; and (2) the National Anthem in its original form, &c. The former, I imagine, was the "God save the Kinge" on folio 56 of the MS. volume, and the latter was, of course, the "Ayre" on folio 98. I have previously remarked that several pieces of varying character were written between the folios 56 and 98; by again referring to the index (page 196) it will be seen that they were five in number, sacred and secular; therefore in order to justify the union of "God save the King" to the "Ayre" it would be necessary to insert some direction in the MS.

It will be interesting here to present a complete copy of the programme so often referred to:—

By command of
His Majesty the King of Hanover,
At Christ Church, Newgate Street,
August 3, 1843.
Selections from the ORGAN AND VOCAL MUSIC
Composed by
DR. JOHN BULL,

Professor of Music in Gresham College, Organist of the Chapels Royal in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and Organist and Chamber Musician to his Majesty King James the First.
Born 1563. Died 1622.*

No. I. Vorspiele, or Prelude in Four Parts, composed by Dr. Bull, on the Lutheran Choral Hymn, "Vater unser im Himmelreich." The Melody is placed in the Tenor or Third Part, and is performed by the Obligato Pedal. It is composed in the Doric Key of the Ancient Church Tones. The MSS. in the possession of Mr. Richard Clark.

No. II. The same Choral—taken from the original Choral Book of Dr. Martin Luther, 1540; and harmonised in Four Parts, by John Sebastian Bach, 1750.

No. III. Four Movements, selected from the original MSS. of Dr. Bull, in the possession of Mr. Richard Clark, of Her Majesty's Chapels Royal, and of St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey; and in the original Virginal Book of Queen Elizabeth in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge.

1. Ayre in the Key C; in $\frac{3}{4}$ time.
2. Air varied in C; in Common time.
3. Ayre in C; in $\frac{3}{4}$ time.
4. Andante in F; in Common time.

No. IV. Prayer for the King, from the original MSS. of Dr. Bull, on a Gregorian Melody, with Obligato Organ Accompaniment. "O Lord Almighty God, whose righteousness is like the strong mountains, and Thy judgments like the great deep: after the multitude of Thy mercies save the King who puts his trust in Thee, and evermore mightily defend him for Jesus Christ His sake; to whom with Thee and the Holy Ghost be all honour and glory. Amen."

No. V. Prelude and Ayre in G Major, composed by Dr. Bull, from the Virginal Book in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge.

No. VI. The original Music of the National Anthem, "God save the King," composed and performed by Dr. Bull on the occasion of His Majesty King James's visit to Merchant Taylor's Hall, 1607, in commemoration of his escape from the Powder Plot.

1. The Prelude, or Introduction to the National Anthem for the Organ, with an Obligato Trumpet Accompaniment.
2. The National Anthem in its original form, note for note, from the MSS. in the possession of Mr. Richard Clark.

The Vocal Music will be sung by Miss Rainforth; Masters Stevens and Sullivan; Messrs. Young, Bayley, Howe, Lockey, Bradbury, Allen, and R. Clark.

Organ—Dr. Gauntlett.

MUSIC IN CONNECTION WITH DANCING.

By Charles K. Salaman.

In preceding numbers this subject has been treated, as far as practicable, chronologically from the most remote period to our own time. In this and a succeeding paper it is proposed to take a rapid survey of music and the dance in various parts of the world. National dances and national dance music will necessarily be brought under notice, as well as popular customs and festivals which are intimately connected with them. National character, in the formation of which climate is held to be a chief agent, is supposed to be represented in them. This is very perceptible when we contemplate man in his savage condition. "Music, poetry, and dancing," observes a learned writer of the last century, "make up the ruling pastimes, adorn the feasts, compose the religion, fix the manners, strengthen the policy, and even form the future paradise of savage man. . . . . By these attractive and powerful arts they celebrate their public solemnities, by these they lament their public and private calamities, the death of friends, or the loss of warriors. By these united, they express their joy in their marriages, harvests, hunting, victories; praise the great actions of their gods and heroes, excite each other to war and brave exploits, or to suffer death and torments with unshaken fortitude." It is a notewo. hy fact that nations in their savage state never improve upon the practices of their ancestors. As dancing and music are practised by them in our day, so they were exercised by them ages ago, and, unless cultivation should supersede uncivilisation, so they will be exercised in the future. While love is the ruling passion which inspires the music and dance of civilised communities, war and hunting and their concomitant incidents furnish savage races with subjects for the use of the same arts. In his "Mœurs de Sauvages," Lafitau, a Jesuit missionary, who died in 1740, gives an account of the festivals and solemn ceremonies of many tribes of North American Indians, among whom are specially mentioned the "Iroquois and Hurons."

He describes their song-feasts in combination with their dance-feasts. Every occurrence is commemorated by public dancing and singing, accompanied by rhythmic music performed upon pulsatile instruments. During the performance of a song-dance, called the Athanrout, the Chiefs of the tribe rise with dignity from their seats, and mark its time by movements of their heads, knees, and shoulders. Every Indian has an independent performance of his own, which, without studying the convenience or humour of his neighbours, he repeats as often as it pleases him. Wild shouts of approbation greet those who offer to dance, and they are accompanied by the measured beat of a drum with remarkable precision, the whole assembly moving fantastically with corresponding gesticulations of the head and body. Now and then a horrid shout breaks the monotony of the entertainment. These wild Indians have so accurate a sense of musical measure that they seldom or never err in its application. Young and vigorous Indians dance and jump actively. In their songs they improvise praise to their gods and heroes, as well as to individuals present, and they never omit to praise themselves, an amiable weakness not always confined to uncivilised tribes. A troupe of Wild American Indians was brought to this country for exhibition a few years ago by Catlin. I witnessed their performances, which comprised war and hunting dances and songs, and many of their native customs. Their attitudes and wild gestures, with uplifted war hatchets, while dancing in single file before the spectators in the manner of their marching to war, were very striking and curious. Their musical accompaniment was the measured beat of a drum. Every dance was said to be suggestive of some political event, national pastime, or warlike pursuit. They attract buffaloes by the performance of a dance called the "Buffaloes' dance." They celebrate the accumulation of snow, which is favourable for hunting, by a "Snow-shoe dance." This is accompanied by a hymn to the Great

* An error. Dr. Bull died in 1628, as has been previously stated.

Spirit. Catlin gives an account of a grand festival commemorated by five or six thousand Chocktaws.

A writer of the last century mentions the dances of the Mexicans as being characterised by energy and wildness. They consisted of leaping, jumping, and fantastic gestures. Their music was tuneless and noisy, performed on rudely made pipes and drums. More recently Mexico has adopted many of the common dances of Spain, and, with them, their music. In 1848, Ruxton, in his Mexican travels, tells us that he arrived at a Meson, or public-house, frequented by Arieros, or muleteers, while a Baile, or dance, was going on. It was to celebrate the safe arrival of an Atago from Durango. The entertainment was held al fresco, the Meson being too limited in size to accommodate the numerous spectators. Three guitarists and a tambourine-player were seated under the portales, or doorway. The women wore no stockings, but they displayed pretty feet and ankles, of which they are vain, in tightly fitting shoes, and their entire dresses were very picturesque. The dances bore some resemblance to the Fandango and Arabe of Spain, but they were less elegant, while the pantomimic action was more energetic. Different trades and professions are represented in their dances. There were El Zapatero, the shoemaker, El Sastroncito, the little tailor, and El Espadero, the swordsman. The guitar-players were at the same time very active, both in playing and singing songs descriptive of the dances.

Garcilos de la Vega, the Peruvian historian, descended from the ancient Incas of Peru, tells us that the ancient Peruvians had numerous dramatic and mimetic representations, of which music and dancing were prominent features, besides innumerable songs. The manner of dancing in Peru, during the last century, was peculiar. The arms of the dancers hung down, or were wrapped in a kind of mantle, so that the inflections of the body and the activity of the feet were alone visible. A national dance called Zapatas, "Shoes," was then very popular. The dancers struck alternately with their heels and toes as they traversed the ground. We see here the origin of the modern "Breakdown" as revived by the Americans. Paul Marcoy's "Travels in South America" furnish some interesting data in respect to modern dancing and music in Peru and in other countries through which he passed from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean. At Conibo the women perform a death-song and dance around the corpse, called Chirinqui, to the following strain, which is repeated ad libitum:—

It is sung slowly from the depths of their throats, from which hard guttural sounds ascend as from a cavern. The dancers are clad in very primitive fashion, with their arms bent, and their hands brought up to the level of their shoulders, having the palms turned to the ground. When the mourners are tired from their circular movements, and hoarse from singing, they are permitted to take a brief repose and a cup of wine. In the Conibo language this strange dance is called Ransai. The corpse is buried where the dance-song has been executed. At Sarayacu, Peru, M. Marcoy witnessed dances connected with some religious observances at Christmas-tide. The church Atrium, or Courtyard, was decorated with garlands of flowers, green palms, and flags; a table was laid, and a repast was served to the wearied traveller, the monks, and the chief Father. They were waited upon by the Christmas-Queen and her attendants. Six male Bayadères danced during the banquet, blowing cow's horns. Then songs and dances succeeded each other rapidly. The fête of the "Immaculate Conception" was celebrated by a procession round the church, the dancers gamboling and frisking before the image of the Virgin, the Patroness of Sarayaca, as the Cuzco dancers do on the Easter Monday fête before the figure of Christ. The Serenade and the homage on New Year's Eve presented some strange features. A crowd of converts entered the refectory of the convent with torches, and executed a kind of Pyrrhic dance. After the Ballet, men, women, and children kissed the Father's hands and fell on their knees before him. On the afternoon of New Year's Day the men danced with one another in the native style of Ucayali, while the women, excited by drink, left their homes and danced in groups Farandoles of their own invention. Other peculiar dances of Peru limited space prevents me from dwelling upon, and I can only name the Bayente, or devil's jig, a dance very strange and characteristic. The uncivilised races of South America unite with their passion for singing and dancing a taste for flowers and perfumes.

The Corroboree of the Australian aborigines is described by Charles Reade. It commences with a war-song sung by a chief, the burden of which is that "he slew his enemy and he fell." This frequently repeated song is each time differently accentuated. Then the tune, without any words, is used to accompany the dance. Two figures, ghastly with white paint, bound forwards out of the gloom into a lurid light, like "Jacks-in-boxes." Their dancing was not ungraceful. They were followed at intervals by other dancers painted differently. They advanced singly, and thus the number of dancers was continuously increasing. The singers became more energetic; the musicians drummed faster and louder by well-arranged gradations; their motions rose in intensity until they all warmed into the Corroboree jump; legs striding wide apart, heads turned over one shoulder, eyes glaring with fiendish light, in one direction; both arms raised and grasping waddies and boomerangs, till at length they worked themselves up to such a state of fierce buck-like leaps that for every beat of music there was a jump. Now they were four abreast, and as the front line jumped to the right, each keeping his distance to a hair, the second line jumped to the left. These motions were admirably executed. When the spectators were wrought up to as fierce a state of excitement as the performers, the dance suddenly ceased.

More than a century ago a religious sect, entitled "The Christians of St. Thomas," was discovered by certain missionaries dwelling on the coast of Malabar in a manner extremely primitive and simple. La Croze relates that among their customs derived from Pagan ancestors, music, poetry, and dancing were conspicuous. Their dance was preceded by religious ceremonies: they made the sign of the cross, chanted the Lord's Prayer, and chanted hymns to their patron saint, "Thomas." About the same period the author of "Les lettres édifiantes" visited the coast of Coromandel and witnessed a domestic entertainment in which he discovered "considerable art, propriety in the dances, and a kind of music, harmonious, yet wild and irregular."

La Danza of Cuba, styled generally Habaneras, the music of which, in $\frac{2}{4}$ measure, is very graceful, is popular not only in the "Pearl of the Antilles," but in many parts of South America. The bass movement of the Habaneras is always the same, whether for instrumental or vocal music. The accompaniment consists of a long and a short note, followed by two long notes in duple measure. The melody occasionally appearing in triplets against the bass imparts to it a peculiar grace and expressive abandon, requiring for its local sentiment a tempo rubato—a musical term now well understood. Walter Goodman, in his interesting volume, "The Pearl of the Antilles; or, An Artist in Cuba," gives a graphic description of the famous Danza Criolla as danced by the upper classes of Cuba, and of the popular dances as performed by the native negroes. He says: "The step of La Danza is distantly related to a slow valse, but, being accompanied by certain graceful movements of the limbs, vulgarly termed in Creole vernacular La Sopimpa, the excitement is far greater than it is with the fastest trois temps on record. . . . The pleasure of the dance is greatly enhanced by the quality of the music, which is more or less inspiriting according to the air selected. Among the best Cuban dances are La Cocuyé, La Chupadera, La Calabazon, La Sopimpa, La Mulata, La Politta Americana, El Merenquito, Los Lunarcitos, Al Medodia, and à las Bellas Cubanas. The Clarionet takes the lead in the band of black musicians, and the Güiro and tambours serve to mark the peculiar chopping compass which is the leading feature of the Creole Dance." The Güiro is a musical instrument rudely formed from a dry calabash. It is "notched in such a manner that a hollow grating sound is produced by scraping the rough surface with a fragment of bone."

With the music of La Danza Criolla is sometimes joined doggerel verses improvised for the occasion, containing some local humour conveyed in corrupt Spanish, of which the following lines, connected with La Chupadera, may be received as a specimen:—

> Que la chupadera á real está vendiendose,
> Cuando chupamos, cuando llueve, todo mojamos, &c.

These are nonsense-lines, "which," says the author, "emphatically affirm that at a certain period of the (Carnival) day one may get comfortably tipsy for the small sum of fivepence; and they further demonstrate how rain and rum can alike moisten the human body." Touching the music of the Habaneras, the author of "The Pearl of the Antilles" says: "The productions of such foreigners as have been inspired to compose pieces founded on Cuban music are also included in Don Laureano's repertory. Ravina's far-famed Habaneras, Gottschalk's Ojos Criollos, and Salaman's Spanish Caprice are favourites with a Cuban audience. But like all Cuban and Spanish music, they require to be played with a certain local sentiment, and it is for this reason that the most accomplished European performers often fail to satisfy the Cuban (musical) appetite."

The negroes of the neighbouring island, Jamaica, avail themselves of every occasion to dance and sing. They invent tunes to which they connect words without sense or meaning. They sing extempore songs in which are introduced the most trifling events of the day, and any occurrence which may have taken hold of their fancy. Their national dance called Sh-y-shay resembles, in some respects, the dances of India and Egypt, the dancers moving their feet less than the upper part of their body. The negroes also have vigorous dances during which they exhibit commendable agility. Their specially national tunes are respectively designated, "Jackass with him long tail," and "Kalembi," otherwise "Monkey, monkey, play the fiddle."

We will now pay a brief visit to the interior of Africa.

In all the parts of that vast continent which have been explored by Europeans it would seem that, however savage the tribes, music, poetry, and dancing are among their chief pleasures. They lighten their labours by extempore songs and dances. The love of Africans for the latter exercise is carried to an almost incredible passion. Mungo Park relates an anecdote of some negroes who implored on their knees an European to cease from playing dance tunes on the violin. They urged the impossibility of their desisting from dancing so long as the fiddle continued to sound, and that, unless he should have mercy upon them and end his performance, they must inevitably dance themselves to death. While dancing they advance and retreat, they jump and stamp, bow their heads to the ground as they pass each other, and place themselves in the most ridiculous postures. The native marriage ceremony is accompanied by dances and songs. In the Mandingo country there is a matrimonial usage called "Mumbo Jumbo," for punishing disobedient wives. The ceremony commences as usual with songs and dances which last until midnight, when the chastisement is inflicted. Wrestling matches are always succeeded by dancing. The performers are provided with bells attached to their arms and legs. The dance is accompanied by rhythmic music performed on the native drum. This instrument serves also as a kind of speech for imitating certain Mandingo phrases; for instance, when the wrestling is about to begin the drummer strikes his drum three times. This is understood to mean Alibæ-see, Sit you down! "upon which," says Mungo Park, "the spectators at once seat themselves. The drummer again strikes Am-uta, Am-uta, Take hold! take hold!"

From the difference in their modes of life and pursuits, and from other circumstances, there is considerable variety in the respective characters of the two great classes into which the people of Arabia are divided, viz., those who lead a roving pastoral life in the desert, called the Bedoueens, and those who reside in cities, as do the Arabs of Egypt. Surrounded as the roving Arabs have always been by scenes of grandeur and sublimity; dwelling as they have ever dwelt amid the awful silence of the desert, their minds have become impressed with fanciful and vivid images, and they have thus acquired a love of poetry and music, and of her sister Muse, dancing. When Europe was yet steeped in superstition and ignorance, Arabia had her poets, musicians, and dancers. As early as the eighth century, the celebrated Caliph of Bagdad, Haroun al Raschid, or Aaron the Just, who was himself skilled in poetry and music, was a liberal patron of those arts. The Caliph Vathek, a thousand years ago, was no less proficient. Schools of music were established at Cordova and at Bagdad, and they produced many highly distinguished musicians: Isaac Almouseli is ranked by the Orientals among the most skilful. Al Farabi has been styled the Arabian Orpheus. His accomplishments were multifarious. He is said to have composed a piece of music divided into three movements; the first of which threw the Sultan of Aleppo, Saifadowlah, into a fit of laughter, the second melted him to tears, and the third lulled him, as well as the performers, to sleep. Dancing was the favourite accomplishment of the Spanish Arabs, and to them Europe is indebted for some of the most famous dances and dance measures in music, to which allusion has been made in former numbers. "The Arabian, like the Indian women," says Calmet, "have little golden bells fastened round their necks and elbows, to the sound of which they dance." There is a song-dance, common all over the desert, called Messamer. Youths and maidens join in the Chorus and accompany the song with clapping of hands and various motions of the body, after the manner of the ancients. It is a kind of Serenade of a lover to his mistress. Arabian lovers have sometimes rather a strange, and, I am inclined to think, not a courteous mode of expressing their passion in their love-songs. Take the following as an example :—

Oh Ghalia! If my father were a jackass,
I would sell him to purchase thee!

The Egyptian Arabs have their singing men and women, and their men and women dancers. Their female singers are called Awalim, or Almèhs. Their women dancers bear the name of Ghawazèe. Allateeyeh is the designation for a musician of the male sex, and Khuwals for men dancers. Many travellers in Egypt have fallen into the error of confounding the Almèhs with the Ghawazèe. The latter are a distinct class from the former, and indeed belong to a separate tribe. The singing girls sometimes combine dancing with their singing, and, in like manner, the dancing girls include singing in their dances. The musical instruments used to accompany the dancing are the Rebab, the Kemengheh, both stringed instruments, the brass castanets, the Darabooka drum, the Tar, a kind of timbrel, and a wind instrument called the Nay. All these instruments may be seen in the musical instrument department of the South Kensington Museum.

The following picturesque account of the Dance of an Almèh in Egypt, by Paul Lenoir ("The Fayoum, or Artists in Egypt"), will be welcome in this place. "Hasné, the dancer," says our author, "made her entrée in a most impetuous fashion, draped in a long blue robe spangled with gold, and caught up at the girdle by fringes of embroidered silk—a dress which added strangely to her wild aspect. . . . The orchestra was composed of three instruments, as singular in their way as the dance which they were about to accompany, viz., the Daraboôka, the Kemengheh, and the Zoumara, a shepherd's double pipe. At the first beat of the Darabooka Hasné bounded into the centre of the tent. . . . . Slow and cadenced in her motions at first, the dancer hardly moved from the spot to which her feet seemed to be fastened; then, the rhythm of the music quickening a little, minute hurried steps seconded the indescribable inflections of her whole body; and, as the musicians played more and more quickly, the gestures, the contortions, the least movements of the arms and the head of the dancer became more feverish and wild. When she reached the paroxysm of this rhythmical epileptic fit, she sank down, and, huddled together on her knees, threw herself into wondrously passionate and picturesque attitudes. There certainly was infinite grace in the way in which she seemed to yield and abandon herself to these nervous convulsions. She combined the suppleness of the serpent with the elegance of the gazelle."

In her delightful work, "The Inner Life of Syria," Mrs. Burton gives a description of Arab dancing as practised in Syria at the present time. She does not appear to have greatly admired the singing nor the music of Syria, which is always composed in the ancient minor scale, with the intervals of the 6th and 7th minor. But of the pas seul of a Syrian dancing girl she says: "One thing which perhaps you will not understand is that her dancing means something, whereas ours is only intended for exercise, or to give people a chance of talking. She has told you by pantomime whole histories—of how she was at home with her mother, and how she went to market and to the bazaar; how she did the washing and cooking; how her father (the Shakh) wanted her to marry, and how she didn't want to marry, for that Ali was fighting far away in the desert. She wonders if he thinks of her, and she looks at the moon, and knows he can see it too, and asks when he will come back. Now the music and the steps change. He is coming back, and they are dressing her to be his bride; she is walking in the bridal procession, veiling her face for shame." This is the poetry of the Terpsichorean art. Aided by the pathetic, albeit monotonous, character of Arabian music, of which specimens may be found in Lane's "Modern Egypt," and in "Le Désert" of Félicien David, simply harmonised in conformity with the Oriental style of its melody, pantomimic dancing, as pictured by Mrs. Burton, is susceptible of the most intense expression, and capable of affording to a spectator of imagination considerable delight. Dancing has been defined "poetry in action." With an Eastern background, and an appropriate musical accompaniment, this definition should be at once intelligible. Unhappily reality in art often falls far short of the fascination with which the imagination invests it. Maurice, in his "Indian Antiquities," says: "The women of the Idol, or dancing girls of the Pagoda, have little golden bells fastened to their feet, the soft harmonious tinkling of which vibrates in unison with the exquisite melody of their voices." This, perhaps too highly coloured picture of Oriental dancing, is commemorative of some richly descriptive lines in Thomas Moore's "Light of the Harem":—

Here the music of prayer from a minaret swells,
Here the Magian his arm full of perfume is swinging,
And here at the altar a zone of sweet bells
Round the waist of some fair Indian dancer is ringing.

The most important festival celebrated by the Hindûs is called the Nautch. While the festival lasts every kind of business is suspended. The Bayadères or Nautch girls perform their dances before a statue of the ten-armed goddess, Durga, which is worshipped and jealously watched by the Brahmin priests. The Bayadères, or professional dancing and singing girls of India, like most of the inhabitants of tropical climates, excel in what has aptly been termed "the eloquence of the body." They dance less with their feet than with their hips and hands, and their dances, accompanied by the monotonous sounds of a Tom-tom, are senseless and tedious. The girls, in long ample costumes, are decorated with expensive jewellery in bracelets and anklets, and, according to European notions of female beauty, are generally ugly and coarse in feature, although finely formed.

A modern witness of the native customs of India thus describes a grand Nautch exhibition: "The Bayadères crouching down near the musicians, awaiting the signal for the dance to commence, formed a striking group. The dancers rose up, and unfolding their scarfs and shaking their skirts they caused the bells to vibrate which were fastened round their ankles in the form of bracelets and served to mark the time. After a preliminary chorus, accompanied by viols and tom-toms, they formed in a semicircle, and one of them advanced close to us. With rounded arms, and her veil floating, she turned herself slowly round with a gentle quivering of the body, so as to make her bells resound. The music, soft and languishing, seemed to lull her senses, and with eyes half closed she seemed to be clasping in her embrace some invisible being. All played their parts thus in succession: one feigning herself a serpent-charmer or a lute-player, another, ardent and impassioned, bounding and whirling round with rapidity, while another, adorned with an elegant cap embroidered with pearls, addressed us with strange gestures and followed the music with a coquettish movement of the body. They concluded their performances with an animated round dance, accompanied by songs and clapping of hands." The Nautch dance appears to have no attractions for an European after the novelty of a first performance. Deficient in variety of movement and grace, it is found to be wearisome. We unwisely make our own performances the standard by which we judge those of other countries. The interest in witnessing the customs and art-performances of distant continents should be derived from their entire unlikeness to those with which we are familiar, however extravagant and strange they may be. The native music of India consists of short melodies, never exceeding sixteen bars in length, without modulation, and unharmonised. There is noticeable monotony in the music, but often much pathetic expression. A few Hindū and Bengalee tunes have become familiar to Anglo-Indians; but the most pleasing tunes are not so generally known. With judicious harmony in character with them, there are many Indian airs which might be rendered attractive to Europeans. Sir Thomas Elyot in his "Governor" (sixteenth century), says: "In India, where the people honoureth the sun, they assemble together, and when the sun first appeareth, joining in a dance they salute him, supposing that forasmuch as he moveth without sensible noise it pleaseth him best to be likewise saluted, that is to say with a pleasant motion and silence." These observations cannot be supposed to apply to the Hindū or Mahometan natives of India. The old English knight's reference to the Worship of the Sun would seem to point to the customs of the Parsees of Bombay.

The Siamese claim three national dances, the Cone, the Lacone, and the Raban. The first represents a combat, the dancers being armed and hideously masked. A stringed instrument of the viol family is its ordinary accompaniment. The performers both dance and sing alternately and simultaneously ad libitum. The burdens of their songs are the chief events of Siamese history. The Raban is a stately dance approaching in manner to a march, and has a vocal accompaniment. The singing is alternately guttural and nasal, and the "music" is without harmony and tedious. Monsieur Goguet ("Extraits des Histoires Chinois") tells us that the Twentieth King of the Ninth Period improved the dance and music of China, and that dancing was held in such high esteem that there was an old-established axiom that the reign of a king could be judged of by the dances then in use. This idea may have had a fabulous origin, but the actual condition of music and dancing was held to represent Chinese public opinion. Neither in China nor in India do the respectable native classes dance. They are amazed at the folly of Europeans giving themselves the trouble to dance when they can pay professional dancers to relieve them from such unnecessary fatigue! The Chinese admire pantomimic representation, in which dancing and music play an important part. The "Sun and Moon" is a famous spectacle, and "The Meeting of the Spring" a celebrated public festival. Specimens of Chinese music may be seen in Dr. Crotch's "Specimens" of music of all nations and periods. Weber has used for the subject of his Turandot Overture a genuine Chinese tune. During the Great Exhibition of 1851 in Hyde Park a Chinese collection of native art and manufacture was exhibited in its vicinity. There was a daily musical performance of native Chinese music by Chinese singers and instrumentalists. I heard one "Chinese concert," and had no desire to listen to a second.

By Joseph Bennett.

No. IV.—BEETHOVEN (continued).

Last month we traced the course of Beethoven's health-trouble, as far as it appears in the letters, through the first stage of his career. We had ample evidence of the mental agony it caused; of the morbidity which it engendered in his sensitive temperament, and of his almost passionate desire that the result of a physical disability should not be mistaken for an act of will. Now let us go once more over the same period of time and follow the progress of the money-trouble which, in grim reality or in the master's fancy, dogged his steps through life. Here, also, matter will be presented which throws a strong light upon the development of Beethoven's character.

It is significant that the first letter in Beethoven's own hand is an apology to Dr. Schade of Augsburg for not returning a small sum borrowed. The reader will have in mind that when the young musician was returning from Vienna to Bonn, in consequence of his mother's illness, he found himself at Augsburg without sufficient funds. Dr. Schade came to his help in this emergency with three gold carolins, and some time after—how long does not appear—Beethoven was moved to explain why they were not returned. "I can easily imagine," he writes, "what you must think of me, and I cannot deny that you have too good grounds for an unfavourable opinion. I shall not, however, attempt to justify myself until I have explained to you the reason why my apologies should be accepted." After relating the circumstances of his mother's death, to which attention has already been drawn, he goes on: "Imagine yourself in my place, and then I shall hope to receive your forgiveness for my long silence. You showed extreme kindness and friendship by lending me three carolins in Augsburg, but I must entreat your indulgence for a time. My journey cost me a great deal, and I have not the smallest hope of earning anything here. Fate is not propitious to me in Bonn. Pardon my intruding on you so long with my affairs, but all that I have said was necessary for my justification. I do entreat you not to deprive me of your valuable friendship; nothing do I wish so much as in any degree to become worthy of your regard." A very proper letter, this, for any young man in such circumstances to write; and especially interesting as giving the earliest proof of Beethoven's almost morbid desire to stand well with friends and neighbours—a desire that found agonised expression in the famous "testament" addressed to his brothers. At what time the master settled his little money transaction with Dr. Schade it is impossible to say from the evidence before us, inasmuch as no further reference to it appears. But we may take for granted that not long after Beethoven returned to Vienna and began, as we shall presently see, to turn his talents into gold, the three so-useful carolins found their way back to the good doctor's pocket, accompanied by the blessing that always rewards him who helps a brother in distress. Curiously enough, the second letter, like the first, has to do with money, though the circumstances attending it are very different. Beethoven's father died in December, 1792, closing a shabby and unprofitable life—unprofitable save that it gave the world the father's son—in poverty and such disgrace as attends a man who flings away his chances in the battle for existence. The elder Beethoven, who, as everybody knows, was Court tenor to the Elector of Cologne, had been pensioned some years before his death, but, on account of improvident habits, 100 R. thalers were ordered to be deducted annually from the amount bestowed and entrusted to young Ludwig for the maintenance of the other boys. This deduction the graceless Court tenor had grace enough to feel acutely, significant as it was of the low condition to which he had fallen. How he acted in the premises had better be told in Beethoven's own words, addressed to the Elector after the father's death: "It was my intention to present this decree (ordering the deduction) to your Highness's treasurer, but my father earnestly implored me to desist from doing so, that he might not be thus publicly proclaimed incapable of himself supporting his family, adding that he would engage to pay me the twenty-five R. T. quarterly, which he punctually did. After his death, however, in December last, wishing to reap the benefit of your Highness's gracious boon by presenting the decree, I was startled to find that my father had destroyed it." One feels a measure of compassion for the poor, wrecked creature who saw in the Electoral decree an official record of his incapacity and a mark of subordination to his own son. He could hardly live in the house with it. There must have seized upon him, one would think, a growing desire to tear it in pieces, to stamp upon it, to burn it, or to do something or other to annihilate such a symbol of degradation. So the poor tenor got at the paper surreptitiously and made away with it; taking care to pay regularly the amount agreed upon, so that the document might never be required in order to be put in force. But the destruction of the decree brought some little trouble upon Ludwig after his father's death. Without it he could not obtain his stipulated share from the Electoral treasury, and hence the memorial already quoted, in which we further read: "I, therefore, with all dutiful respect, entreat your Highness to renew this decree, and to order the paymaster of your Highness's treasury to grant me the last quarter of this benevolent addition to my salary, due the beginning of February." It is satisfactory to know that the Elector complied with his organist's request, and issued a decree on May 3 by which Beethoven was entitled to draw the twenty-five thalers due to him from the final instalment of the then extinct pension.

The scene now shifts to Vienna, and the time is advanced to June, 1800, when the master was thirty years old. At this period Beethoven was prospering even in his own estimation, and he never pretended to optimist views on the matter. Read, for example, the subjoined portion of a letter addressed to Herr Wegeler of Bonn: "You desire to know something of my position; well, it is by no means bad. However incredible it may appear, I must tell you that Lichnowsky has been, and still is, my warmest friend (slight differences occurred occasionally between us, and yet they only served to strengthen our friendship). He settled on me last year the sum of 600 florins (£60), for which I am to draw on him till I can procure some suitable situation. My compositions are very profitable, and I may really say that I have almost more commissions than it is possible for me to execute. I can have six or seven publishers or more for every piece if I choose: they no longer bargain with me—I demand, and they pay—so you see this is a very good thing. For instance, I have a friend in distress, and my purse does not admit of my assisting him at once, but I have only to sit down and write, and in a short time he is relieved. I am also become more economical than formerly." It is curious to find Beethoven writing in such a strain, but just then, for some reason or other, he looked upon his worldly prospects with a sanguine eye. Referring in the same letter to the possibility of again visiting Rhineland he says: "When this may be I cannot yet tell, but at all events I may say that you shall not see me again till I have become not only eminent as an artist, but better and more perfect as a man; and if the condition of our fatherland be then more prosperous, my art shall be entirely devoted to the benefit of the poor. Oh, blissful moment! how happy do I esteem myself that I can expedite it and bring it to pass!" Beethoven, as we shall see, often longed for the time thus anticipated—a time when, relieved of all care as to his own circumstances, he could devote himself solely to art. Looking forward to such a condition it was natural that he should shape his gratitude into some useful form, and hence the reference to the poor. His sincerity in this we cannot doubt. Beethoven was always generous when he had anything to give. Later in the same year (1800) we find a letter to Hoffmeister of Leipsic, which puts the relations between Beethoven and his publishers on a somewhat less agreeable footing. Hoffmeister had applied to the master for the privilege of publishing some of his works, and received an amiable answer, not free, however, from the writer's characteristic bitterness: "If you are as conscientious, my dear brother, as many other publishers, who grind to death us poor composers, you will know pretty well how to derive ample profit when the works appear. . . In your answer you can yourself fix the prices, and as you are neither an Italian nor a Jew, nor am I either, we shall no doubt quickly agree." From this it would seem that the days of "I demand, and they pay" were over; but whether because Beethoven asked too much or the publishers refused to give enough, does not appear. A second letter to Hoffmeister on the same business is specially interesting, since it throws light not only upon Beethoven's impatience of money matters, but also upon his dream of an existence in which no such mundane considerations could trouble him. He writes: "The entire sum for the four works will amount to seventy ducats. I understand no currency but Vienna ducats, so how many dollars in gold they make in your money is no affair of mine, for really I am a very bad man of business and accountant. Now this troublesome business is concluded — I call it so, heartily wishing it could be otherwise here below! There ought to be only one grand depôt of art in the world, to which the artist might repair with his works, and on presenting them receive what he required; but as it now is, one must be half a tradesman besides—and how is this to be endured? Good heavens! I may well call it troublesome." A subsequent letter to Hoffmeister contains another outburst of impatience at the enforced connection of this proud artistic nature with the sordid trammels of life—Pegasus harnessed to a dung-cart!—"I would gladly make you a present of all my works if I could do so and still get on in the world, but, remember, most people are provided for and know what they have to live on, while, good heavens! where can an appointment be found at the Imperial Court for such a parvum talentum com ego?" In 1807, the master's earnest desire to obtain a position of competence, not for itself alone, but that he might be free to labour in the interests of art, took the form of a memorial to the directors of the Vienna Court Theatre. Writing in the third person, and referring to the position gained by him in the Imperial city, he said: "Nevertheless he has had difficulties of every kind to contend against and has not hitherto been so fortunate as to acquire a position that would enable him to live solely for art, and to develop his talents to a still higher degree of perfection, which ought to be the aim of every artist, thus ensuring future independence instead of mere casual profits." After insisting that his leading idea was not to gain a livelihood so much as to benefit art, and expressing a wish to remain in Vienna, the master suggested that the directors should secure to him "a permanent position more propitious to the future exercise of his talents" by paying a fixed salary of 2,400 florins and allowing a free benefit, in return for which he engaged to compose annually at least one grand opera, and one operetta or divertissement. Beethoven added with something of pathos: "Surely the above conditions cannot be thought exorbitant or unreasonable, when the expenditure of time and energy entailed by the production of an opera is taken into account. . . . It must also be considered how prejudicial the present rate of exchange is to artists here, and likewise the high price of the necessaries of life, whilst a residence in foreign countries is open to them." Beethoven pleading thus for £260 a year, and in return for two important works per annum, is a sorry sight, but it is still more pitiful to recall the fact that he pleaded in vain. The purblind princes and counts who directed the Court Theatre would have nothing to say to the bargain, and the lyric drama lost a splendid chance. A year later (November, 1808, or 1088, as the careless master wrote) there are renewed indications that lack of worldly wisdom had perpetuated trouble. Addressing Count von Oppersdorf, to whom is dedicated the Fourth Symphony, Beethoven wrote: "I fear you will look upon me with displeasure when I tell you that necessity compelled me not only to dispose of the Symphony I wrote for you, but to transfer another also to some one else. Be assured, however, that you shall soon receive the one I intend for you." But the clouds were breaking, and the sun seemed on the point of coming out: "I am at this moment staying with Countess Erdödy in the apartments below those of Prince Lichnowsky. . . . My circumstances are mproving, without having recourse to the intervention of people who treat their friends insultingly. I have also the offer of being made Capellmeister to the King of Westphalia, and it is possible that I may accept the proposal." The Westphalian offer, even though it came from the brother (Jerome) of his discarded idol, Napoleon, had attractions. Jerome promised him 600 gold ducats for life and 150 for travelling expenses, in return for which the master was required to play occasionally before the king, and to conduct his chamber concerts. Beethoven, however, could not tear himself away from Vienna, if, indeed, he ever seriously contemplated doing so. That he announced his probable acceptance of Jerome's offer we have seen, but this may have arisen from a shrewd notion that the prospect of losing him would stimulate the Viennese nobility to more handsome behaviour. At any rate, a memorial appeared at this time in which Beethoven formulated the terms he was willing to regard as equivalent to a perpetual retaining fee. These conditions were four in number. First, a life salary of 4,000 florins (nominally £400), with freedom to devote himself exclusively to the production of great works. Second, the privilege of travel, "for in this way alone can he make himself known and acquire some fortune." Third, the title of Imperial Capellmeister, any salary attached to the office to be taken in lieu of an equal portion of the guaranteed income. Fourth, an annual benefit concert on Palm Sunday in the Theater an der Wien. Whether this memorial was ever presented is doubtful. What we know is that Beethoven did not go to Westphalia, but remained at Vienna in such a condition of worldly ease as could be derived from a pension of 4,000 florins, guaranteed by Archduke Rudolph, Prince Kinsky, and Prince Lobkowitz, then reduced in value, by the depreciation of paper money, to about £200. Henceforward the letters contain no reference to money matters, till 1812, when we find Beethoven rich enough to spare forty ducats for a "first-rate repeater," and generous enough to repel with some little warmth an offer of payment for services rendered to charity. Recalling his previously expressed desire to exercise his art on behalf of the poor, it is interesting to meet with the subjoined passage: "If the wish to benefit the poor were not so evident in your letter, I should have felt not a little offended at your accompanying your request to me by an offer of payment. From my childhood, whenever my art could be serviceable to suffering humanity, I have never allowed any other motive to influence me, and never required anything beyond the heartfelt gratification that it always caused me." Generous ideas like these deserved reward, but instead thereof Beethoven, the very same year, found himself in serious trouble owing to a continued depreciation of the currency in which his salary was paid, and especially to a government measure creating a new species of paper (Einlösungsscheine), making it the only legal tender, and forcibly converting bank-notes into it at one-fifth of their nominal value. This decree would have reduced Beethoven's salary to £80 had not the Archduke first, and afterwards Prince Lobkowitz, agreed to pay their shares—1,500 and 700 florins respectively—in paper money of the new issue. An almost savage letter to Zmeskall expresses the master's feelings at this juncture: "I am offered a certificate that the archduke is to pay in Einlösungsscheine, but I think this unnecessary, more especially as the people about Court, in spite of all their apparent friendship for me, declare that my demands are not just!!! Oh, heaven! aid me in enduring this! I am no Hercules, to help Atlas in carrying the world, or to strive to do so in his place. . . . My endurance of these shameful attacks cannot endure much longer; persecuted art will everywhere find an asylum. Dædalus, though imprisoned in a labyrinth, found wings to carry him aloft. Oh! I too shall find wings!" But Beethoven did not fly away. As we have seen, Lobkowitz agreed to continue his share of the salary at its full value, following the example set by the Archduke; and the master lost no time in begging Prince Kinsky, the third contributor, to do the same as regarded his proportion—1,800 florins. The Prince at once consented, remarking to Beethoven, who saw him at Prague, that he entirely admitted the propriety of the demand, and considered it quite reasonable. Furthermore, he paid sixty ducats (600 florins currency) on account, and promised an order on his treasurer to remit the salary in the new paper money. But Kinsky, though a just man, seems to have been dilatory. The order was delayed, and eventually its issue was made impossible, the Prince being killed by a fall from his horse in November, 1812. Under these untoward circumstances Beethoven addressed a memorial to the widowed Princess, setting forth the facts of the case, and concluding as follows: "My title to the liquidation of my claim is proved by the testimony of the Herren von Varnhagen and Oliva, to whom his highness spoke on the subject, reiterating his consent. I feel convinced that the illustrious heirs and family of the Prince will, in the same spirit of benevolence and generosity, strive to fulfil his intentions. I therefore confidently place in Y. H.'s hands my respectful petition." The Princess, like her deceased husband, saw the force of Beethoven's argument, but could not act in the matter without the sanction of the court which had assumed guardianship of the estate. The composer, however, soon returned to the charge, asking that the arrears of his salary might be paid "without prejudice," as lawyers have it; hoping that if his legal right could not be established the family would carry out the wishes of their late head, and believing that "The same elevated sentiments which prompted you to fulfil the engagement entered into by the late Prince, will also make Y. H. apprehend the absolute necessity entailed on me by my position again to solicit immediate payment of the arrears of my salary, which are indispensable for my maintenance." Nothing came of this appeal, and only when the Princess had been legally named guardian, did Beethoven once more take the matter up, writing in urgent language: "You can easily understand that, relying on a thing as a certainty, it is painful to be so long deprived of it, especially as I am obliged entirely to support an unfortunate sickly brother and his whole family, which (not computing my wants) has entirely exhausted my resources, having expected to provide for myself by the payment of my salary." The poverty thus referred to only in part arose from the Kinsky affair. Prince Lobkowitz had got into difficulties, and for several years his contribution to Beethoven's salary was not forthcoming. It is to this the master refers when writing to the Archduke Rudolph in July, 1813:—"To me a residence in town during the summer is misery, and when I also remember that I am thus prevented waiting on Y. R. H. it is still more vexatious and annoying. It is in fact the Lobkowitz and Kinsky affairs that keep me here. Instead of pondering over a number of bars I am obliged constantly to reflect on the number of peregrinations I am forced to make." In the summer of 1814 we find the Kinsky business still unsettled. The family refused to pay, and Beethoven, who could be obstinate on occasion, determined to make them do so by a process of law, engaging for that purpose first a Dr. Wolf and next Herr J. Kauka, of Prague. To the last-named gentleman he wrote several letters which have been preserved. In one we read: "Think of me, and do not forget that you represent a disinterested artist in opposition to a niggardly family. Strive, my dear friend, to accelerate the tardy steps of justice. Whenever I feel myself elevated high, and in happy moments revel in my artistic sphere, circumstances drag me down again, and none more than these lawsuits." At another time Beethoven wrote angrily: "Should the affair turn out badly for me by the conduct of the Kinsky family, I will publish it in every newspaper, to their disgrace." The suit dragged on, as suits will in all countries; and later in the year we find Beethoven making a humorous reference to it, as his occasional manner was when addressing the friendly Archduke: "As for Prince Lobkowitz, his pauses with me shall still continue, and I fear he will never come in at the right place; and in Prague (good heavens! with regard to Prince Kinsky's affair) they scarcely as yet know what a figured bass is, for they sing in slow, long-drawn, choral notes, some of these sustained through sixteen bars. As all these discords seem likely to be very slowly resolved, it is best to bring forward only those which we can ourselves resolve, and to give up the rest to inevitable fate." But Beethoven did not leave the Kinsky discord to fate. He solicited and obtained the intervention of the Archduke on his behalf, and plied Kauka with many letters, asserting over and over again his moral right to the sum demanded, concluding one of them with the pitiful cry, "Do not forget me, tormented creature that I am! Act for me and effect for me all that is possible." At last it became evident even to Beethoven that his case did not rest upon absolute legal proof. Hence his willingness to make a compromise, in order not to lose all, and the urgent manner in which he begged Kauka to secure at least 1,500 florins new currency. "May your friendship," he added, "accelerate the affair! If it ends badly, then I must leave Vienna, because I could not possibly live on my income, for here things have come to such a pass that everything has risen to the highest price, and that price must be paid." Eventually, in January, 1815, the dispute was settled by an agreement on the one side to give, and on the other to receive, the annual sum of 1,200 florins.

This painful business, wrote Beethoven in his letter of thanks to Kauka, "has cost me many tears and much sorrow." But it cost him nothing of the high character which should belong to a great artist. The master was clearly within his right, especially as Prince Kinsky stood foremost among those who urged him to decline King Jerome's offer. Besides the affair was one upon which Beethoven's means of existence hung, and he had no alternative but to follow it out to the end. None the less, even at this distance of time, does it make painful reading. Could Beethoven return to life it seems that the world would be at his feet; that the rich would compete with each other to give out of their riches, and the poor out of their poverty, all that he could possibly need. Wherefore, looking back upon the sordid cares that harassed him, and upon the struggles for a miserable pittance that distracted his mind, we are lost in wonder. But he who would have had it otherwise is perhaps mistaken, as far as concerns the master's work. Out of the misfortunes rather than the enjoyments of life does genius gather the materials for development; and, when we remember under what conditions masters like Mozart, Schubert, and Beethoven sang their undying songs, it is easy to believe with Shakespeare that—

> Which, like the toad, ugly and venomous
> Wears yet a precious jewel in its head.

MUSICAL LECTURES.

By Henry C. Lunn.

The utility of lectures, in a purely educational point of view, has often been questioned; but it appears to us that this question has arisen rather from experience in the abuse than in the use of them. In medical institutions it is understood that the lectures delivered to the pupils form a very important part of the course of study; but then they are always delivered by persons of the ripest experience in the especial subjects upon which they treat, and are only intended for and listened to by students; indeed, we have often heard from those studying for the medical profession that they have learnt more from the practical illustrations at a single lecture than they could acquire by poring over books for months. Yet, although it is comparatively easy to demonstrate anatomical facts, there are other subjects which are extremely difficult to handle in a lecture so that the audience shall acquire any real knowledge; and this has no doubt led to the practice, so common in the present day, of providing an entertainment the several items of which shall be strung together by a running commentary which, for want of a better term, is called a "lecture." Few persons who attend these expect any more than an evening's amusement, and there is of course no valid reason why they should not be thus gratified; but there is an objection to their being called "lectures," not only because the term should be kept exclusively for well-digested discourses conveying instruction on matters connected with art or science, but because the person who styles himself the "lecturer" is put on a level in position with those whose place in public estimation entitles them to be listened to with the deepest interest. All who peruse the advertisements in our newspapers, or read the announcements at the doors of the various literary institutions or concert-rooms in the metropolis, must have been struck with the manner in which the word "lecture" is constantly used, in order to give a scientific air to a very commonplace attraction; and we have often wondered whether, if discussion on the subject chosen were permitted at the conclusion of the evening, the so-called "lecturer" would be sufficiently "crammed" to avoid displaying his ignorance. A man, for example, believes, rightly or wrongly, that he has a peculiar talent for reading from the works of the celebrated humorous authors and identifying himself with the various characters introduced. Instead of boldly doing this, however, he advertises a "lecture" on the genius of the writers in this branch of literature, offering a few remarks of his own upon their respective styles, which any tolerably educated schoolboy could do as well, and relying exclusively upon the strength of his readings for any real effect he may produce upon his hearers. Another, who has got up a few chemical experiments from popular books, gives a "lecture on chemistry," in which he shows all that he knows and a great deal that he does not know of the science, and receives much applause for exhibiting the effects of chemical combinations which anybody can produce with equal success in his own room. A third, who wishes to display his power of "making-up," as it is termed, in various national costumes and speaking in several languages, gets up a "lecture on the dress, manners, and language of the inhabitants of the four quarters of the globe, with illustrations," in which he delivers conventional truths from our school geographies in order to cement together a heterogeneous mass of materials which appear to defy cohesion by any other process. Of course there can be no reason why any limit should be placed to this species of entertainment: why not, for instance, a "lecture on bootmaking," showing the process of cutting-out and putting together a boot from the first; or an open-air "lecture on pyrotechny," interspersed with discharges of rockets, maroons, and serpents, and the exhibition of various set pieces?

The subject of musical lectures is one which we find exceedingly delicate to handle; for the many excellent professors who deliver their mature thoughts upon the art in this form, not only to students at our academical establishments but to the general public, is gradually increasing. In truth, however, we need scarcely fear that those to whom we are indebted for educational work of this high character can imagine that we wish in the slightest degree to cast a slur upon their labours; indeed it is solely with the desire of still more ennobling their labours, by pointing out the difference between the true and the false lecture, that we offer these remarks. If we were called upon to define the difference between the two, we should say that in the former the illustrations grow from the lecture, and in the second that the lecture grows from the illustrations. We can scarcely imagine that any real good will result to the art from the number of small concerts which, under the name of lectures, are constantly offered to the public; yet, unless some earnest protest is made against such entertainments, there can be little doubt that they will continue to spread; for, as we have already hinted, whilst the concert-giver thus exalts himself into the position of a lecturer, artists, both vocal and instrumental, can be brought forward to aid in the "illustrations" who would most certainly not be considered competent to appear at a so-called concert. It will hardly perhaps be believed how often we have ourselves received applications from strangers saying that they have resolved to give lectures upon music, and requesting us to have the kindness to name the works they should consult to qualify them for the task. No doubt many of these persons are perfectly sincere in their endeavour to extract from the best musical books a reliable record of facts and opinions upon the art which may serve as a peg upon which to hang the illustrations; but what respect can be entertained for one who first selects a subject to lecture upon, and then begins to inquire for a list of the authors who can supply the requisite information for the purpose?

We have very great faith in lectures, provided their true intent is thoroughly carried out. There can be no possible reason why they should be what is usually termed "dry;" but the aim should be to instruct rather than to amuse. In our musical institutions much good may be effected by courses of lectures delivered by the ablest professors upon every branch of the art; and even in schools we are convinced that a higher tone of thought might be fostered were music to be habitually spoken of in lectures as something more than a mere accomplishment. The elevating influence of the art as a portion of general education should be constantly enforced; the various schools of music should be dwelt upon and illustrated; and if during the lessons reference were occasionally made to subjects which had been explained in these periodical addresses to the pupils, a spirit of emulation would be awakened which could not fail to lead to the most gratifying results.

Dr. Eben Tourjée's "grand musical and educational excursion to Europe, including Northern Ireland, Scotland, France, Belgium, the Rhine district, Northern Prussia, Switzerland, and a visit to the Paris Exhibition," will leave New York on June 29, and return, "weather permitting," in sixty days. Hard work, even for the speediest of Yankee scamperers through classic lands; and even if the excursionists did no more than make post-haste and look about moderately as they ran, they would be pretty well "used up" on reaching the place whence they set out. But Dr. Eben Tourjée is a remarkable man, and those who accept his offer at the price of 400 dollars must be remarkable also. For he proposes to take with him a staff of "professors," whose business will be to lecture the excursionists from an educational point of view. Music, of course, stands well to the fore in the proposed "course;" and concerts are to be given on board the specially engaged steamer Devonia, the excursionists having a right of free admission. We are sorry to find an American contemporary making light of this privilege, and roundly stating that "if there are concerts on board the steamer the excursionists have to look for virtuosi among themselves." As to the free admission this sarcastic print observes, "it is a general rule on board the steamers, for it would not be advisable to chuck those who refuse to pay the admission-fee overboard, or to put them in a dark closet till the concert is over." But, besides the performances, it is proposed to have daily choral practice under the direction of Herr Carl Zerrahn. Truly a funny notion in the case of a lot of sea-sick people, and our contemporary derides it accordingly: "Imagine twenty young ladies who did not sleep very well on account of a rough sea during the night. They appear on deck at 8 a.m. pale, shivering, bundled up in wrappings, blankets, and shawls, and wish they had never undertaken this trip to the Old World. They abuse Tourjée, they hate Zerrahn, they detest the musical and educational purposes. . . A cup of coffee and a biscuit is their morning meal, and after two hours' rest on deck they feel their strength coming back, their blood becomes warm again; and just as they are comfortable, the stalwart figure of Mr. Carl Zerrahn appears on deck, and bâton in hand smilingly invites them down to the saloon for choral practice. . . . After an hour or so of choral practice, . . . we see the poor victimised creatures running up-stairs to breathe again God's fresh pure air, which is not yet adulterated by Dr. Tourjée's educational projects." We shrewdly imagine that our contemporary wastes his pity on the excursionists. Human nature is stronger than any "programme;" and when human nature goes out for a holiday, especially when it proposes to cross the Atlantic twice and "do" Europe in sixty days, it won't endure lecturing nor even choral practice in a saloon "wholly unique in steamer architecture." It is very likely, moreover, that Herr Carl Zerrahn will be glad to lay up his bâton, and the professors to keep their notebooks under lock and key.

It is a common idea in England that Germany is a musical country in the sense that its people en masse love and cultivate the art. But Mr. John Howard, once a student at Leipsic, now a professor in America and a contributor to Church's Musical Visitor, is of a different opinion. Mr. Howard lived for three months at Koelsa, a town with 1,500 inhabitants, situated about twelve miles from his alma mater, and he declares that in the place there were but two pianos, one owned by the restaurant-keeper, the other by the minister. "But such pianos! One note in every three or four was dumb, the others as wheezy as a Denver asthmatic and excruciatingly out of tune. . . . The minister could thump out the first movement of a simple waltz, . . . the restaurant-keeper could play a march or two in the shabbiest style." Other musicians in the place, save the organist, there were none, unless we may so call the owner of a solitary flute, who "picked his way painfully and with frequent halts" through popular songs. Mr. Howard well remembers his first visit to the Koelsa church. Of the organ he says: "What I heard was a perfect Pandemonium of noise, with the devil of discord broken loose and raging." So much was the instrument out of tune, that "the intervals of the musical scale were so faintly indicated that the same amusing effect upon the mind was produced as by the distant suspicion of a good joke." As for the singing, "thirty or forty baggy and buttony boys lounged in the choir-loft in various attitudes, all vociferating in staccato unison upon such notes as they could reach. When the grand old choral soared above their voices they desisted as if by common consent, until again it dipped to their level, when they broke in upon it with short playground shouts and evident satisfaction. And through it all the pedagogic organist blazed steadily away, while the peasants listened with open-mouthed enjoyment." The writer adds that he visited several neighbouring towns, only to find a similar condition of things, and he concludes by asserting: "Music among the rural Germans, at least of Saxony and Prussia, must be regarded as a myth, a delusion, a pretty fancy annihilated by an ugly fact." If this evidence be true, as we have no reason to doubt, England is, after all, not so far behind the musical country par excellence. We cannot point to such a brilliant array of great masters, but, on the other hand, there is no English Koelsa, with its two bad pianos, its appalling organ, and its "baggy and buttony" choir. Whether it is better to concentrate music in a few centres or to spread it with some approach to equality over the whole country is a question we are sufficiently English to decide in favour of England.

Some time ago we heard of a coming Congress of Continental Operatic managers to debate on the question of the salaries paid to favourite vocalists. No news has yet reached us of this important meeting having taken place; but if anything were necessary to spur those interested in the matter to active exertion, we cannot imagine a fact more stimulating than that of the manager of La Scala, at Milan, having recently lost large sums nightly from having to pay 10,000 francs (£400) to Madame Patti and Signor Nicolini for each performance. It seems scarcely necessary to assert the palpable truth that such terms must render pecuniary success impossible; but, viewed in its effect upon the art, the subject is worthy the serious attention, not only of lessees, but of all real music-lovers. If Opera is to be anything but a means of exhibiting the vocal qualifications of the two or three petted singers of the day, a public must grow up outside the fashionable temples of the lyrical drama ready and willing to support a manager who places on his stage good works the ensemble of which shall be in every respect thoroughly satisfactory. Band and chorus, as well as principal singers, must be perfectly trained; and the scenery, without startling by any sensational effects, must be in strict accordance with the design of the composer. During the short season of Italian Opera given last autumn by Mr. Mapleson, crowded houses assembled to witness the performance of works the cast of which was generally efficient, but without the attraction of any particular "star;" and Mr. Carl Rosa has also proved that Operas in English, as well as English Operas, can be successfully managed on the same principle. Once let reigning vocalists become aware that the exorbitant sums they demand will be firmly resisted in every capital they visit, and for the first time they will discover their real place in art. It is assuredly necessary to agitate for this reform when we read that this or that Opera has been chosen for representation by the prima donna of the establishment; and for the information of those who are desirous of ascertaining what tangible success crowns the efforts of these public idols, let us draw attention to the fact that the value of the diamonds worn by Madame Marie Roze-Mapleson when she appeared as Aïda, in Chicago, amounted to twenty-four thousand pounds sterling.

Byron says that it took him more trouble to write an "Impromptu" than any other species of short poem; and we may all perhaps have a strong suspicion that in his private letters to Murray he had a lingering hope that they might one day be published. Whenever this desire is apparently uppermost in the mind of a celebrated man who is constantly inditing elaborate epistles to his friends, there cannot perhaps be any violation of faith in giving them forth to the world; yet we cannot but believe that, as a rule, such communications should either be preserved as autographs by the family to one of the members of which they are addressed, or at once consigned to the flames. But if letters consisting merely of everyday gossip should be held thus sacred, how much more important is it that those containing opinions should not be reproduced long after their author can protest against such a breach of confidence. We all know, for example, how often an eminent and kindly disposed musical authority upon receiving the composition of a young student will write to thank him for it, and accompany these thanks with the observation that he has played or sung it through and likes it very much. Of course, having shown the courtesy of a gentleman, he has no idea that his letter will be published as the "opinion" of an artist; and it is only when he sees this "testimonial" in print that he begins to discover the trap that has been laid for him. That this has been in many cases actually done is within our own knowledge; and it is therefore good to caution those who hold sufficiently high rank in the profession to be careful how they write remarks upon works sent to them, unless they object not to their being turned to mercantile use. Of course there can be no possible reason why a composer should not submit the result of his labours to a competent judge, and proclaim his favourable verdict upon it in an advertisement; but it should only be after obtaining his full sanction to such a proceeding. Our strictures can obviously be directed only to those who use their private friendships as a means of obtaining public profit.

We are not in a position to judge of the merits of Mr. Jerome Hopkins's "Biblical and Legendary Opera," in three acts, called "Samuel," recently produced in New York; but an American paper which has been forwarded to us thinks so highly of its artistic claims that it holds up to ridicule the criticisms of all who venture to say one word against it. Of course it is not for us to advocate either side in this controversy; but when we are told that the work was "dramatised, composed, scored, rehearsed, and placed upon the stage inside of four months and a half" that "it had but three stage rehearsals and but two orchestral ones;" that it claims originality, amongst other things, by the total absence of recitative, and "the adaptation to the stage of ecclesiastical intoning on changed harmonic fundamentals;" that there are "no fagotti used throughout," and great surprise is expressed that "all these slight features seem to have escaped our friends the critics' pens,"—we cannot but feel that Mr. Jerome Hopkins's champion is somewhat hard upon those who, not having had the same opportunity of acquiring these scraps of information, were compelled to write upon the Opera after merely hearing it. But, curiously enough, in the same journal which contains this strong praise of Hopkins, we find equally strong dispraise of Handel: "The Oratorio Society's first concert at Steinway Hall," it is said, "was well attended, and presented Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus,' a work but little known here, and (with due respect to its great author) small loss to the public that it is so. The semichorus, 'See the conquering hero comes' has alone kept this Oratorio alive in England, and this only because the English love to be, and so often have been, 'conquering heroes' themselves—always excepting that little affair with the United States you know!—that they naturally sympathise with the conquering-hero sentiment." Let us hope that those depreciators of "Samuel" will not mercilessly retaliate upon this depreciator of "Judas Maccabæus."

Our Parisian contemporary, Le Ménestrel, has a lively London correspondent who, during the operatic season, keeps the readers of that paper both informed and amused with reference to our artistic doings. M. de Retz, for so he calls himself, was at Covent Garden on the opening night, as a matter of course, and afterwards favoured Le Ménestrel with a description of the scene. "The house," wrote this vivacious, not to say imaginative correspondent, "newly 'done up,' is sparkling with lights, diamonds, flowers, white shoulders, and bald heads. The Prince and Princess of Wales occupy the royal box. The flower of the aristocracy are in the pit tier and the grand tier. Everywhere there is a public delighted with and convinced as to the importance of this first manifestation of life in society. They seek each other, recognise each other, salute each other. The maestro, Vianesi, takes his seat—thunders of applause. The curtain rises and the chorus sings the National Anthem—greater enthusiasm still, this year above all. Finally, throughout the representation, the artists known and loved are received by similar 'bravos,' which appear to say 'Enchanted to see you again, ladies and gentlemen.'" Our readers may or may not be surprised to learn that we were present on the occasion, and brought away an idea that the performance and its reception were about as tame and cold as they could possibly be. A more depressing evening, as it seemed to us, was never spent under Mr. Gye's roof. How can we explain the discrepancy? Only by reading more of M. de Retz's letter, in which it is stated that when "Fra Diavolo" was given, the Prince of Wales went behind the scenes and expressed to Signor Tagliafico his regret at not seeing him play in that work. The exaltation of Signor Tagliafico's spirit may have coloured the purview of "M. de Retz," seeing that wherever the able stage-manager of Covent Garden may be, there also is the amusing correspondent of Le Ménestrel.

We are glad to announce that arrangements have been made for giving a representative English concert in the palace of the Trocadéro on Wednesday, July 17. The programme will contain works by English composers only, and it is hoped that the executants in every case may be English also. The difficulty is to procure an orchestra, but even supposing that the orchestra officially connected with the Exhibition has to be used for instrumental works, the vocal performers will all go over from this country. Dr. Arthur Sullivan has the general direction of the enterprise, assisted by Mr. Henry Leslie, whose famous Choir will be present en masse. As regards English vocal music, therefore, England is sure of being well represented. The best of our Madrigals and Glees, sung as Mr. Leslie's Choir sings them, cannot fail to make a deep impression upon foreign connoisseurs, and may even go far to dissipate the notion that music in England is an exotic having no affinity to the soil. We understand that the Prince of Wales will be present at the concert, and it is hoped that His Royal Highness will also attend the performances given by the choir on July 18 and 20. On the 21st takes place the great Festival of Orphéonists. On the day following there will be a competition of French choirs, and on the 23rd an international competition, out of which we shall expect the English singers to come victorious. But whatever the result of the struggle, it is something to have England represented in the lists, and by a body certain not to disgrace her pretensions.

The receipt of pressing letters from many young composers who have forwarded music for review is a convincing proof that they fancy they have a just cause of complaint against us for passing over compositions on the merit of which—aided by the adulation of injudicious friends—they have formed a most exalted opinion. Let us therefore at once say that we never throw aside works which appear to us to possess that promise of future excellence in their authors which is worth encouraging. But we see in the present day such a tendency to fritter away, instead of to mature, that creative power which should be regarded by the musically gifted few as a sacred trust, that we have little faith in producing the slightest effect upon those who have gained a temporary success by any adverse criticism, however tenderly it may be worded, and however kindly it may be meant. The sketchy and fragmentary style which grows upon a composer by the habit of writing down the notes over which his fingers almost unconsciously wander is happily commented upon by Schumann in his "Rules and Maxims for Young Musicians." Speaking of extempore playing, he says: "Beware of giving yourself up too often to a talent that will lead you to waste time and strength on shadow-pictures. You will only obtain mastery of form and the power of clear construction through the firm outlines of the pen. Write more than you improvise therefore." To this we can add nothing save that these words should not only be read but taken to heart by every student who regards his art as anything more than a mere idle plaything.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On the opening night at this establishment, the 20th ult., Mdlle. Marimon received a warm welcome as Amina, in "La Sonnambula," a character which displays both her histrionic and vocal qualifications to the utmost advantage. The whole of the sleep-walking scene was extremely good; and in the florid Finale her executive facility was heartily acknowledged by the audience. Mdlle. Bauermeister evinced a marked improvement in the part of Lisa, and Signor Bettini was a fairly satisfactory Elvino. On the 25th ult. "Dinorah" was given, Mdlle. Marimon sustaining for the first time the character of the heroine, and achieving a success which we hope will secure for her a more prominent position than she occupied during the last season at the Royal Italian Opera. The Opera was in other respects well cast, Mdlle. Tremelli, who made her first appearance in the small part of the Caprajo, winning enthusiastic applause by her excellent singing (the Canzonetta "Fanciulle che il core" being encored), and Corentino and Hoël having most efficient representatives in Signori Bettini and Rota, respectively. The Opera is excellently placed upon the stage, the storm scene, the design of which has been taken from the Paris Opéra-Comique, being particularly effective. The début of Mdlle. Minnie Hauk, as the heroine in "La Traviata"—announced for the 27th ult.—occurs too late for notice in our present number.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

Mr. Gye has been most unfortunate in his laudable attempt to keep faith with his subscribers and the public, for although he commenced his season, as announced in his prospectus, on the 2nd ult., the débuts of Mdlle. Bertelli and Mdlle. Sarda have been constantly postponed in consequence of indisposition. Mdlle. Bertelli, who at length appeared as Leonora in "Il Trovatore," is a good but not a great singer. She has a soprano voice of agreeable quality, which was better displayed in the slow portion of the Cavatina, "Tacea la notte," than in the more dramatic scenes of the Opera, for the due realisation of which she seemed to have scarcely sufficient physical power. She was heard to greater advantage as Agata, in "Der Freischütz," the music of which she gave with much earnestness, particularly the Scena so well known as "Softly sighs." A legitimate success was however obtained by Mdlle. Sarda, who made her début as Amina, in "La Sonnambula." Both as an actress and a vocalist this young artist evinced the possession of such decided talent that she at once won the good opinion of the audience, and the applause after all the principal airs (especially those demanding the most pathetic expression), and at the conclusion of the opera, was most enthusiastic. The first appearances of Mdlle. de Rita, as Donna Anna, in "Don Giovanni," and Signor Carbone as the Count di Luna, in "Il Trovatore," it would be unkind to dwell upon. Mdlle. Zaré Thalberg has returned this season with an increase of power, and Signor Gayarré, especially as Max, in "Der Freischütz, evidences a marked improvement, although to us his style is by no means pleasing. Mention, too, must be made of the successful appearance of M. Jamet, who, as Caspar, in the last named Opera, sang with excellent effect throughout.

CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY.—ADELPHI THEATRE.

The "Marriage of Figaro," with which this establishment closed for the season on the 6th ult., gave Mdlle. Fechter an opportunity of materially advancing herself in public favour by her excellent singing and acting as the page Cherubino; and there can be little doubt that had she originally appeared in this character she would have made a more decidedly favourable first impression upon the audience. The "Flying Dutchman" was again one of the most attractive Operas, Mr. Ludwig, as Van der Decken, winning the good opinion of all competent judges, and proving himself a worthy successor of Mr. Santley. Miss Julia Gaylord and Mr. Maas must also be mentioned in the highest terms; and too much praise cannot be awarded to the lessee for the earnest manner in which he has worked during the season. As we anticipated, Herr Brüll's "Golden cross" has not fulfilled the sanguine expectations which were formed of it, in consequence we presume of its cordial recognition in Germany; and we hope and believe that we shall not hear of it again. The opening of the two Italian Opera houses no doubt limited Mr. Carl Rosa's performances to a period extending over only eight weeks; but we feel confident that he might safely have continued them, even with such formidable rivals in the field.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

The name of Edouard Lalo, a distinguished French violinist and composer, appeared in the programme of a Crystal Palace Concert for the first time on Saturday, the 30th of March, when his "Sinfonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, was brought forward by Senor Sarasate, for whom it was composed, and to whom it is dedicated. Another concerto by the same composer, for violin and orchestra, had been played by Senor Sarasate at one of the Philharmonic Concerts of 1874, but had failed to create any great impression. The present work is in our opinion far superior to its predecessor. Its form is rather that of a symphony with an important obbligato for violin solo than that of an orthodox concerto; it is in four movements —an Allegro, Scherzando, Andante, and Rondo—all of which are symphonic in their style and proportions. The music is highly original and very melodious; the solo part is written with a thorough knowledge of the genius of the violin, and the orchestration is both brilliant and ingenious. Senor Sarasate performed the principal part in an irreproachable manner, and the important accompaniments were given under Mr. Manns's direction with the utmost finish. The work was warmly received and deserves a second hearing. The ever welcome fragments of Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor formed another important item in this concert, which also included the overtures to "Egmont" and "Genoveva," songs by Herr Henschel, and a violin solo by Senor Sarasate.

On the 6th ult. Herr and Madame Joachim were the special attractions of the concert, the programme of which included three works from the pen of the great violinist. The first of these was his "Elegiac Overture," composed in memory of Heinrich von Kleist, and first performed at Cambridge last year on the occasion of the conferring the degree of Doctor of Music on Herr Joachim. The work, which had been once previously played at the Crystal Palace, is remarkable for learning and sound musicianship rather than for inspiration; though full of interest, it is perhaps somewhat deficient in charm. Herr Joachim also played his own "Hungarian Concerto" in D minor, this being its fourth performance at these concerts. The musical value of this work is, we think, superior to that of the overture just mentioned, and it is likely to rank among the best of its author's compositions. The Concerto was played as probably no one but Herr Joachim could play it. The third work of his at this concert was a scene from "Marfa" from Schiller's "Demetrius," for contralto and orchestra, which was sung by Madame Joachim. The lady also gave Gluck's magnificent air, "Divinités du Styx," from "Alceste." This piece, one of the finest and most expressive that Gluck ever wrote, is far too seldom heard in our concert-rooms—probably because it requires a really great singer with a grand declamatory style to do it justice. The Adagio from Viotti's twenty-second Concerto, played by Herr Joachim, two songs by Madame Joachim, and the C minor Symphony of Beethoven completed the programme of this concert.

One of the most interesting concerts of the present season was that of the 13th. Its great feature was a repetition of Brahms's Symphony in C minor. This fine work was heard for the first time in England at Cambridge on March 8, 1877—the occasion above alluded to when Herr Joachim's overture was also produced. It was then given at the Crystal Palace, and in the following month at one of the Philharmonic Concerts; the present was, therefore, its third performance in London. Whether as a whole it will ever be "popular," in the sense in which that term is applied to the symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven, may be doubted: Brahms's style is too reflective, at times too abstruse, to meet with universal appreciation. But the real traces of genius which abound in this symphony, and which become more apparent on each repeated hearing, are such as to secure for this great work a place in the esteem of musicians hardly second to that held by the symphonies of Schumann, with whom Brahms has much in common. The performance at the Palace was worthy alike of Mr. Manns and his orchestra; we could give it no higher praise. At the same concert Mlle. Anna Mehlig gave a very finished reading of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat. The overtures on this afternoon were Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and Mr. J. F. Barnett's "A Winter's Tale;" the latter clever work had been heard rather more than four years ago at the Palace. The solo vocalists were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, and Mr. Barton McGuckin; and the Crystal Palace Choir sang Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and the Morning Hymn from Gade's "Erl King's Daughter." The choir sang very well, but the performance of Mendelssohn's Psalm suffered much from the persistent dragging of the time in the solo part by Madame Sherrington.

On the 20th ult. Reinecke's "In Memoriam," an Introduction, Fugue, and Choral for orchestra, was the opening piece. The work, which had not been heard in England before, is interesting, without being especially striking in its themes, and very clever in its treatment. The subject of the Fugue bears a slight resemblance to that of the overture to "Elijah," and the Choral introduced at the close is the well-known "Passion-Choral"—"O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden." Another novelty at this concert was Max Bruch's fine Romance for violin and orchestra, played by Senor Sarasate. This work has more than once been performed in London with pianoforte accompaniment, but the present was, we believe, the first occasion on which it has been given in its original form. The great Spanish violinist also played very finely Beethoven's violin concerto; and the remaining instrumental pieces of the concert were Schumann's Symphony in B flat and the overture to "Tannhäuser," both of which are too familiar to need comment. The vocalists of the afternoon were Mlles. Thekla Friedländer and Redeker. The former gave Mendelssohn's Concert-aria, "Infelice," the latter some interesting songs by Georg Henschel, and the two joined in duets by Rubinstein and Holländer.

THE BACH CHOIR.

NEVER was the raison d'être of this choir more fully asserted than on the 6th ult. in St. James's Hall, when and where a miscellaneous selection of music was performed under the conductorship of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt. The Bach Choir is described officially as "A Society of Ladies and Gentlemen Amateurs, formed for the performance of choral works of excellence of various schools, assisted by some members of the Choirs of St. Paul's Cathedral and the Chapel Royal." It is not, then, a mere trading corporation dependent for existence upon the favour of the public, and bound to consult, first of all, its own commercial interests even at the expense of art. This, at least, is what we gather from the pretensions of the Society and from its actual achievements. No doubt the Bach Choir would be mightily discouraged were the public to show an indifference to its doings; but the institution exists for art chiefly, and its members are sufficiently earnest as amateurs, and wealthy as individuals, to pursue an independent course self-sustained. Heartily do we wish there were more such. It is to the dire disadvantage of music that between it and the public there must ordinarily be professional "middle-men," who have to live, like other trading classes, upon the goodwill of customers, and are bound to conciliate that goodwill by every available means. With the Bach Choir, happily, the professional middle-man has little or nothing to do. It is as though the drawing-rooms of a musical home were thrown open to anybody from the street with the announcement, "You are welcome to enter and enjoy, for a consideration; but if you choose to pass on, so be it: our programme will not be disturbed in the smallest degree." While dwelling upon these facts, we must not lose sight of the many gallant efforts which regular concert-givers have made in the true interests of art. We have seen them from time to time overlook the most elementary business principles of their craft and take a course from which business success could only arise by the merest chance. In the long run, of course, they have failed, and been obliged to abandon the field or adapt themselves wholly to the taste of the day. But none the less should they receive fairly earned honour, and all the more should we wish well to societies like that under notice, to which the commercial phase of concert-giving is of the smallest account. It is satisfactory, moreover, to find amateurs of the higher classes willing to turn their talents to some public service, and not content to hide them in drawing-rooms. That there is much musical culture among those who are able to devote time and money to its acquirement everybody knows who has had opportunities of observation, and it is no small thing to find the barriers of caste broken down that the gifts in question may spread their influence over a wider area and art receive the fullest benefit they can confer. For various reasons, then, the reappearance of the Bach Choir in St. James's Hall is something to rejoice over; and every true amateur must desire for the young organisation "long continuance and increasing."

The programme of the opening concert of the season possessed abundant interest. It began, for example, with the first three parts of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio," a work not yet sufficiently known, though rapidly taking its place among public treasures. It is hard at the present time to believe that only a very few years—a decade or so—have passed since Herr Schachner introduced a portion of the "Christmas Oratorio" as an absolute novelty to our concert-rooms. Yet the fact is on the pages of undoubted record all the same, and, what is more, those pages tell us that only when Mr. Barnby took up the work during the busy and useful existence of his choir did it become, so to speak, naturalised amongst us. Since then the "Christmas Oratorio" has made rapid progress. Cheap editions have brought its text within easy reach, and the public, though they may never admit Bach in this matter to a level with Handel, are showing a disposition to receive it with growing favour. Readers of the MUSICAL TIMES, we are quite sure, do not need to have put before them another disquisition upon the character and claims of the "Christmas Oratorio." To them the point of greatest interest in connection with the performance at St. James's Hall is the "additional accompaniments" by Mr. E. Prout, which were used for the first time. Concerning these it was officially stated: "Some changes and additions to the orchestration, rendered necessary by the changes that have taken place in the instruments since Bach's date, have been made; and the harmonies indicated by the figured basses, which he himself probably supplied on the organ, have been given to that instrument or the orchestra. This has been done with great care by Mr. Prout." It must needs be, we suppose, that the works of the old masters receive "additional accompaniments," and, if so, recourse should always be had for their supply to the safest man. Mr. Prout is eminently safe. His discretion, taste, and knowledge fit him to be the Robert Franz of England, and we are always glad when such work as that in which Franz excels comes to his hand, because it is certain to be done with more or less of real success. In the present instance we have an example of this. Wherever Mr. Prout has touched Bach's score he seems to have acted not so much with a regard for modern notions of effect as in view of the question, "What would the composer sanction could my work be submitted to him?" This is the spirit which should ever guide the restoring hand, and its manifestation in these days of wild transformings deserves to be pointed out as worthy of honour and reward. The performance of Bach's music, though not uniformly excellent, was very good. Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. Shakespeare, and Herr Henschel were fully competent to give the solos with needful effect, while the band and chorus, under Herr Goldschmidt's watchful guidance, left but little to desire. Some unsteadiness was apparent in the difficult Chorus, "Glory to God;" and the Choral, "Ah! dearest Jesus," could scarcely be pronounced faultless in execution. But, taken for all in all, the performance added to the repute which the Bach Choir has so rapidly earned.

After the "Christmas Oratorio" came Schumann's setting of Rückert's "Neujahrslied," soon to be widely known in England, or we are greatly mistaken, as Schumann's "Song for the New Year." Very little can be ascertained with regard to the origin of this work. The thematic catalogue of the master's compositions simply mentions it, and the notes in the Bach Choir's book of words, which bear evidence of the hand of Mr. George Grove, only tell us that it "appears to date from the year 1850" and that it was first performed in MS. at the Düsseldorf subscription concert of January 11, 1851. But if we do not possess much information about the work, we possess the work itself, Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. having published a cheap edition, with English words by the Rev. J. Troutbeck. The "Song for the New Year" is therefore now generally available, and our numerous choral societies cannot too soon give it their attention, lying as it does within the executive means of most, and distinguished as it is by some of the master's noblest music. We use the word "noblest" advisedly, because while Schumann often appears laboured or obscure to those unfamiliar with his style, here he uses the plainest and most intelligible expressions. There is nothing in the "Song for the New Year" to puzzle anybody. Its music is so simple, broad, and massive, that an English audience familiar with these qualities must at once take it into favour. Though described as for chorus and orchestra, there are frequent solo passages for a bass voice, as well as a duet for soprano and contralto. The interest of the work, as far as interest depends upon structure, is therefore complete. With regard to its subject nothing need be said, since the advent of a new period of time will only cease to excite feeling when time shall be no longer. The "Song" is in six numbers, of which the first begins with a short bass Solo with Chorus and ends with the Duet above named. A tinge of sadness pervades the opening, especially the Choral address to the New Year, "O child, born in darkness." But this disappears with the advent of the Duet, which contrasts future hope and past disappointment. The second number is a Chorus of welcome, "Hail, youthful commander," distinguished by breadth and massiveness of structure. In the opening of No. 4 the Solo voice asks, "The King who is nearing, What bodes his appearing?" and the Chorus answers in words expectant of sorrow as well as gladness—in words, also, which incite to a brave conflict with the ills of life. The whole of this number is in Schumann's best manner, and highly effective as well as characteristic. So, too, is its successor, which carries on the "argument" in the form of a fugal Chorus, "Be ready for reaping." Here the master's contrapuntal resources—and they were not small, as students of his instrumental works know—are drawn upon with very good results. The fugue, however, is not extended, and soon leads into the closing number—also a Chorus, "O prince, waking throned for a year as of right." Here Schumann returns to the broad simplicity of the earlier movements, and works out a finale of considerable elaboration and high interest, the climax being reached when the well-known Choral, "Now thank we all our God," appears as the base of an unpretending contrapuntal structure. The employment of the religious melody is very happily conceived, and the introduction of the Choral in full harmony by way of peroration gives precisely the devotional effect that such a subject seems to require. Even from these few words of description it must be obvious that the "Song for the New Year" adds to the repertory of our musical societies a useful work. It is of small dimensions, it is comparatively easy, it demands no great solo talent, and it bears on each page the stamp of a master's hand. The performance was in all respects excellent, but especially so the singing of the choir, every member of which seemed animated by a desire to give the first hearing of Schumann's work in this country all possible advantage.

So far the concert had done honour to Germany, but now came the turn of England, as represented by one of her greatest church composers, Samuel Sebastian Wesley. Homage from a Bach Choir to a Wesley is peculiarly graceful and appropriate, seeing that it was a Wesley, and the father of Samuel Sebastian, who first asserted in this country the surpassing genius of the Teuton master. Bach was the musical divinity of him who wrote "In exitu Israel," and scarcely less than the father did the son worship at the same shrine. Nothing better could have been conceived, therefore, than the introduction into the Bach programme of an Anthem by the late Organist of Gloucester Cathedral. A good choice was made from the number available—the better because the lot did not fall upon "The Wilderness," or any equally well-known work. In the Anthem composed as an exercise for his degree, "O Lord, Thou art my God," Dr. Wesley's remarkable and solid gifts have the finest possible illustration. He wrote much music more adapted to be popular; but in all his works, so far as they are known to us, nothing has a superior claim to the recognition of connoisseurs. Take for example the opening Chorus, wherein grand passages of effect are mixed up with others distinguished by masterly counterpoint, the double choir being worked with perfect command over all its resources. This alone suffices to stamp the composer as a musician hors ligne. The following bass Solo, "For our heart shall rejoice in Him," is chiefly remarkable for its well-written and never commonplace accompaniment; but in the short Double Chorus, "He will swallow up death," we have all Handel's fire and majesty, and not a little of his boldness, as when in the antepenultimate bar the voices close on the dominant of the key (D minor), the organ following with a cadence in the tonic major. The Sextett, "For this mortal," is equally admirable in its way as a specimen of part-writing, and the whole work comes to a grand and fitting end with an elaborate Double Chorus, written in the most solid and learned style of church composition. The Bach Choir deserves warm thanks for bringing this Anthem into the light of that publicity which its dimensions and character have prevented its receiving elsewhere, especially as by so doing it has enhanced the repute of a musician who, having recently died, has entitled himself to such honours as the world will only bestow post mortem.

The last, but not the least, feature in this remarkable concert was Mendelssohn's Psalm for eight-part chorus and orchestra, "When Israel out of Egypt came." This too is a work that deserves to be better known and appreciated among us, for, strange to say, it has never had bestowed upon it the notice so freely given to most of its companions. That the Psalm will eventually receive its due is certain; how soon depends upon the action of societies like the Bach Choir, which can afford to present works regardless of all considerations save that of merit. The reflection brings us back to the point whence we started, and in closing these remarks we can only repeat a hope that the good service already done may be augmented indefinitely, for the harvest is great and the true labourers are few.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

With the three concerts which took place during last month the twentieth season of this excellent institution has come to a close, an extra concert, specially devoted to a selection of works by Beethoven, having been held on Wednesday afternoon, the 10th ult., at which the quartett party was composed of MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, and Piatti, Mdlle. Anna Mehlig being the pianist, and Madame Joachim contributing vocal solos.

At the first Monday evening of the past month the only novelty introduced to the audience was Mdlle. Krebs's brilliant rendering of three Sonatas, for Pianoforte alone, by Domenico Scarlatti, the gifted son of the great Alessandro, and one of the earliest composers of importance for the instrument in question. The programme also comprised a repetition of Schubert's beautiful Quartett in A minor, exquisitely played by the quartett party above named, and Mozart's Trio for stringed instruments, known as the Divertimento in E flat, in the performance of which those excellent artists, MM. Joachim, Straus, and Piatti, exerted themselves to the utmost to render full justice to the beauties of a work written by the composer while in the full maturity of his genius. The concert concluded with a second performance at these concerts of the new series of "Liebes lieder-Walzer," written to words by Goethe by Herr Brahms, a work replete with originality, but which requires to be oftener heard before its beauties and intrinsic poetical worth can be fully appreciated. The executive artists were Miss Agnes Zimmermann and Mdlle. Marie Krebs, who jointly played the pianoforte accompaniment, Mesdames Sophie Löwe and Redeker, and Messrs. Shakespeare and Pyatt, who formed the vocal quartett. An able translation of the poetry, from the pen of Mrs. Macfarren, was appended to the programme.

The second concert, on the 8th ult., opened with Beethoven's stringed Quartett in E flat (Op. 74), containing the beautiful and specifically "Beethovenish" Allegro, the incidental arpeggio passages in which have caused it to be designated the "Harp Quartett." MM. Joachim, Ries, Straus, and Piatti were the executants. Herr Barth, who was the pianist of the evening, gave a thoughtful and thoroughly artistic reading of Chopin's Sonata in B minor (Op. 58), being at the conclusion of the evening's proceedings associated with MM. Joachim and Piatti in the execution, con amore, of Beethoven's Trio in E flat major, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. Herr Joachim's performance of an Adagio by Hiller, and the Hungarian Dance No. 2 by Brahms-Joachim, elicited the usual vociferous applause, resulting in an encore, to which the great violinist responded by an additional Hungarian Dance of the set. Mr. Sims Reeves, whose appearance was announced in the programme, but who, to the evident disappointment of the audience, was unable to appear in consequence of a severe cold, was replaced at very short notice by Mr. Barton McGuckin, whose capital rendering of the Recitative and Air from Handel's "Jephtha," "Deeper and deeper still," was much and deservedly applauded. Mr. Sidney Naylor was a very able Conductor.

The concluding concert of the season was, as usual, one of especial attraction, both as regards the variety of works selected for performance and the number of sterling artists engaged in their execution, every part of St. James's Hall being thronged by amateurs eager to participate in the enjoyment of what may be called the crême de la crême of the season's offerings. The opening number of the programme was Mendelssohn's posthumous Quintett for stringed instruments in B flat, in the execution of which Herr Joachim again had an opportunity of displaying those special qualities of first violinist which have long ago placed him foremost in the rank of leaders of chamber music. He was most ably supported in the Quintett in question by MM. Ries, Straus, Zerbini, and Piatti. Signor Piatti's noble quality of tone and earnest artistic style were shown to the best advantage in the solo performance of three movements from a Sonata for violoncello by Veracini, another instrumental solo performance being that of Herr Joachim, who had again selected some of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, arranged by the performer for his instrument, and accompanied on the pianoforte by Herr Ignaz Brüll, besides contributing a "Sarabande" and "Tambourin" by Leclair. The pianists were Mdlles. Zimmermann and Krebs, and Herr Ignaz Brüll, who played respectively Etudes from Op. 2 by Henselt, Andante and Rondo Capriccioso in E major by Mendelssohn, and an Impromptu for two pianofortes by Reinecke, the latter being performed by the two last-named artists. Madame Joachim, in her well-known grand and thoughtful manner, delighted the audience by her singing of three Lieder by Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms, the other vocalists of this truly select evening being Mdlles. Friedländer and Redeker and Madame von Asten. The concerts will recommence in November next.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The Concert by the pupils of this Institution, given at St. James's Hall on the 13th ult., was particularly interesting on account of the many compositions of the students contained in the programme. The most remarkable of these was a Pianoforte Concerto in D minor by Mr. A. H. Jackson, in which the young composer has shown not only a commendable desire to escape from the conventional modes of thought, but to avoid falling into those eccentricities which are too often mistaken for original genius. His scoring too is bright, clear, and appropriate throughout, the first and slow movements being especially effective. Mr. Lindsay Deas, who performed the Concerto, deserves warm praise for the manner in which he rendered the work of his fellow-student. The first movement of a Symphony in F sharp minor, by Mr. Myles Birkett Foster, avowedly of a Scottish character, is clever, and contains some good writing, the subject, however, being somewhat trite; and an "Ave Maria," by Mr. H. J. Cockram, with clarionet obbligato (charmingly sung by Miss Samuell), and a Song, to some verses by Victor Hugo, by Miss Maude White (equally well interpreted by Miss Orridge), elicited enthusiastic and well-deserved applause. The only other pupil's composition was a bold and well instrumented Overture by Mr. F. W. W. Bampfylde. Pianoforte solos were given with much success by Miss Percival and Miss Ethel Gregory, and vocal solos by Miss Leonora Braham and Miss Ada Patterson, the latter displaying an exceptionally high soprano voice in Mozart's "Gli angui d'inferno," from "Il Flauto Magico." Mendelssohn's setting of Psalm xcv. successfully tested the powers of the choir, the principal parts being well sung by Miss Mary Davies, Miss Saidie Singleton, and Mr. Sauvage. The concert was ably conducted by Mr. Walter Macfarren.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The principal feature in the fourth concert, on the 28th of March, was the performance of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto by Senor Sarasate, which created so profound an impression upon the audience that he received not only the warmest applause but a double recall. Without instituting comparisons—which are at all times unnecessary where so fine a rendering of a work has been given—we can affirm that not only has the new violinist a pure tone and marvellous executive powers, but in every movement a true appreciation of the composer's meaning was manifested, which showed that the violinist is not only an accomplished performer, but an intellectual artist. The slow movement was given with genuine expression, and the last movement taken at a speed which somewhat overtaxed the powers of the band. The orchestral pieces included Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, and Sir Julius Benedict's highly descriptive Overture to the "Tempest." Herr Henschel's singing of the dramatic Scena, "Wo berg' ich mich," from "Euryanthe," elicited the most enthusiastic plaudits, and Mdlle. Thekla Friedländer was heard to much advantage in a Recitative and Air from Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri." Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted, as usual.

In the prospectus of Her Majesty's Opera for the present season Mr. Mapleson says that he "has been fortunate in securing the services of several new artists," but that he has been unfortunate in not securing the services of old ones will, we fear, seriously affect the success of his season, for the fashionable frequenters of this establishment, who think more of singers than of works, can ill afford to lose Madame Christine Nilsson and M. Faure from the company. In Mdlle. Etelka Gerster, however, he has a thoroughly reliable vocalist, and one who has already won the good opinion of the English public; and the names of Mdlles. Marimon, Alwina Valleria, Caroline Salla, Anna de Belocca, Madame Trebelli, &c., are a sufficient guarantee that, as far at least as the lady vocalists are concerned, we may anticipate a satisfactory cast in the favourite Operas. The new-comers are Mdlle. Minnie Hauk (from whom great things are expected), Mdlles. Mathilde Wilde, Collini, Stella-Faustini, Ida Christofani, Eugenie Pappenheim, Miss Cummings, Signori Marini, Masini, Ordinas, Roveri, and M. Thierry, some of these artists being already known in this country, but appearing at Her Majesty's Opera for the first time. Amongst the tenors, baritones, and basses we find the names of Signor Fancelli (a vocalist who will be warmly welcomed), Signori Bettini, Campanini, Talbo, Runcio, Rota, Del Puente, Foli, &c. We are sorry that Marchetti's "Ruy Blas" is to be reproduced, and could dispense with Verdi's "La Forza del Destino;" but Gounod's "Mirella" and Bizet's "Carmen" (which is also promised by Mr. Gye) will be anxiously looked for. Sir Michael Costa will again be the Conductor, M. Sainton retaining his post as principal violin. Mr. Mapleson says much about the Operas he intends to produce, and the vocalists by whom they are to be rendered; but as he wisely observes, "of all the above, however, the public will have an opportunity of judging for themselves," it becomes a question whether it would not have been better to announce his intentions without any preliminary laudatory remarks.

Those who have merely heard that the new "Melo-Piano"—the invention of Messrs. Kirkman and Son—is a pianoforte with the power of sustaining the sound, have but a faint idea of the many attractive qualities of this beautiful instrument. True it is that it can be played on as an ordinary pianoforte; but by means of a third pedal a cylinder is set in motion and hammers are brought to bear upon the strings, as the keys are pressed down, with such rapidity that the sound, although of course not actually continuous, almost resembles that of a harmonium. The crescendo and diminuendo, produced by an appliance easily moved by the knee—which lengthens or shortens the space through which the hammer falls—prevent any undue harshness when the sound is sustained; and the amount of tone being thus completely at the will of the performer, it is obvious that every shade of expression may be drawn from the instrument by an intellectual player. But not only can the ordinary pianoforte be used without the sostenuto, or the sostenuto without the ordinary pianoforte, but both can be played simultaneously, and the effect is then charming in the extreme, the distinct characteristics of each instrument blending in a manner which certainly cannot be produced by the union of the pianoforte with the harmonium. We earnestly hope that the "Melo-Piano" may obtain as much favour, both from artists and amateurs, as it most unquestionably deserves.

The competition for the Parepa-Rosa Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music was held on Monday the 15th ult. The examiners were Messrs. F. R. Cox, A. Randegger, Brinley Richards, and the Principal, Professor Macfarren. There were thirty candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Marian M'Kenzie. In the competition for the Llewelyn Thomas Gold Medal, held on the same day, the examiners were Messrs. W. H. Cummings, H. C. Deacon, and Chevalier Lemmens. There were fifteen candidates, and the prize was awarded to Leonora Braham. In the competition for the Sterndale Bennett Scholarship, the examiners were Sir Julius Benedict, Messrs. F. R. Cox, H. C. Lunn, Walter Macfarren, A. Randegger, Brinley Richards, and P. Sainton. There were five candidates, and the scholarship was awarded to Henry J. Cockram. The competition for the Professors' Scholarships was held on the 16th ult. The examiners were Messrs. Clinton, Payton, Straus, and Joachim. There were eight candidates, and the scholarships were awarded as follows:—For the violin, to William Sutton; highly commended, Frank W. Arnold. For any other orchestral instrument, to Charles F. E. Catchpole (horn).

At the meeting of the Musical Association held on the 1st ult., C. E. Stephens, Esq., in the chair, a paper was read by Mr. George W. Bullen entitled "The Galin-Paris-Chevé Method of Teaching considered as a Basis of Musical Education." By means of forty diagrams, many of which were vocalised, a practical synopsis of the method was presented, from which it appeared that vocal music formed the basis of instruction, and that pupils were taught to read music from the ordinary notation as they read their language before being allowed to touch an instrument. In the discussion which ensued Mr. J. S. Curwen, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Bosanquet, Mr. M'Naught, Mr. Stephens, and Mr. A. J. Ellis took part. Mr. Bullen, in reply, after justifying the notation of the minor mode on the ground of practical convenience, pointed out that the maintenance of just intonation in many cases of modulation was impossible; and he showed from a modulator that Tonic Sol-faists were continually obliged to sacrifice their theory to practice. The enharmonic scale was then sung to illustrate the power of distinguishing minute intervals. A vote of thanks terminated the proceedings.

The concert of Mdlle. Posie Rossini, which was given at Steinway Hall on the 9th ult., was as successful as could be expected considering that unfortunately the bénéficiaire was prevented, by sudden indisposition, from appearing. The principal vocalists were Miss Elène Webster, Miss Lawrence Eliot, Madame Constantine, Messrs. Stedman, Abercrombie, and Thurley Beale, all of whom were highly effective. A Barcarolle by Spohr and Gavotte by Rameau were excellently rendered on the violin by Herr Polonaski; and special mention must be made of Mr. Oliver King, a young pianist who has, we understand, been studying for some time in Germany. In a clever "Légende," of his own composition, a "Berçeuse" by Chopin, and several other pieces, he created a marked impression, and was warmly applauded. Sir Julius Benedict was the accompanist at the pianoforte.

The appointment of the Rev. S. Joy as Precentor of Ripon Cathedral, with the experience he had acquired in the famous choir of Leeds parish church, has done much to secure the due performance of the cathedral service. On the 24th ult. a new organ was opened, and at the service Mr. Crow, the organist, was assisted by Dr. Armes, of Durham Cathedral, and other organists of the Northern Province. The choir consisted of picked voices from the choirs of York and Durham, and the parish churches of Leeds and Wakefield, the object being to assemble a skilled choir capable of rendering, which it did most effectively, the typical specimens of English and foreign church music. The new organ, built by Messrs. Lewis, of London, consists of three manuals, and, including couplers, has fifty-three draw-stops. In the afternoon there was a public luncheon, and a second service at 3.30 p.m.

On the 27th of March, Mr. Alan Cole read a paper on "State Aid to Music" at the Society of Arts. The lecturer briefly alluded to the manner in which music was assisted by the government in France, Germany, Belgium, and other Continental countries. Numerous conservatoires, he said, were maintained in these countries, whilst in England we had only one, the Royal Academy of Music, to which £500 a year was granted by government. Mention was then made of the one shilling allowed for each musical pupil in elementary schools, and the rest of the lecture was devoted to an appeal for further aid and encouragement for the "National Training School for Music," at South Kensington. The lecture was listened to with much attention, and at the conclusion a vote of thanks was given to Mr. Cole. Sir Edward Du Cane presided.

The very sad case of Mr. Thomas Chapman, for upwards of thirty years associated with Mr. Mitchell's Royal Library, who, whilst in the performance of his duties, was struck with paralysis, has been warmly taken up by a few sympathising friends, with the object of obtaining subscriptions to present him with a purse. As he has not only lost the use of his limbs, but also the power of speech, he is of course rendered incapable of resuming his avocation; and no time should be lost, therefore, by those desirous of assisting him, in forwarding contributions, which will be thankfully received by Mr. Mitchell, 33, Old Bond Street, or Mr. Burrage, Hon. Sec., 45, Tregunter Road, S.W.

The eleventh trial of new compositions by the Musical Artists' Society took place at the Royal Academy of Music on the 6th ult., when a programme of much interest was provided. As the performance cannot be considered in the light of a public appeal, we merely mention that amongst the most attractive pieces were a pianoforte Sonata in C minor, by Mr. George Gear; a Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Mr. G. W. Hammond; and some effective songs by Dr. J. F. Bridge, Stephen Kemp, and C. J. Read. Mr. Charles Gardner accompanied at the pianoforte.

AN excellent performance of Mendelssohn's Operetta "Son and Stranger" was given, for a charitable object, at Langham Hall, on the 6th ult., before a large audience. The melodious, and in many parts highly dramatic music, was so well received as to make us wonder how rarely this work has been heard by English audiences. Miss Leonora Braham (Lisbeth), Miss Amy Gill (Ursula), Mr. Stedman (Hermann), and Mr. Wadmore (Kaus), were most efficient; the last-named artist creating a decided effect not only by his singing, but by the humour he infused into the character. The accompaniments were ably played by Mr. W. H. Thomas and Mr. Oliver King (pianoforte), and Mr. H. M. Higgs (Mustel organ).

WE have much pleasure in drawing attention to the Sunday Organ Recitals by H. Heathcote Statham, Esq., at the Royal Albert Hall, the first of which will be given on the 5th inst. There will be no tickets sold; but we understand that admission will be granted to all who take an interest in the matter. It is intended to include in the series of programmes all the principal organ fugues of Bach (from vols. ii., iii., and iv., of the Leipzig edition), with the special aim of suggesting a variety of effect and treatment, such as the composer would probably have contemplated had he commanded the mechanical resources of a modern organ.

THE St. George's Glee Union gave its usual monthly Concert at the Pimlico Rooms, on Friday the 5th ult., the programme consisting of an admirable selection of sacred music, chiefly from the works of Handel and Mendelssohn. The solo vocalists were Misses Bessie Spear and Clara Nash, and Mr. Thurley Beale. Messrs. F. and F. R. Kinkee played a duet for pianoforte and harmonium with much success; the latter gentleman also giving a pianoforte solo by Sir Sterndale Bennett. Messrs. T. Garside and Joseph Monday, as usual, conducted with great care and judgment.

A CHORAL Festival Service was held in the City Temple on Thursday the 11th ult., when sixteen choirs, or about 400 singers, took part. Three hymns—"Hark, hark my soul," "Come let us join our friends above," and "Onward Christian soldiers"—were sung to tunes by Smart, Beethoven and Sullivan. Dr. Bunnett's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, and Sir George Elvey's Anthem, "Praise the Lord," were also given. The whole service was good, time, tune, and expression being carefully attended to. Mr. Minshall presided at the organ in an efficient manner.

A CONCERT was given by Miss Mulholland at the residence of the Marchioness of Downshire, on the 27th of March, which was fully and fashionably attended. The bénéficiaire, a young Irish lady, who has pursued her studies for some time in Italy, made a highly successful debût, eliciting warm and well-deserved applause, especially in a simple and pleasing song by Lady Arthur Hill, which was encored. Several eminent vocalists lent their assistance on the occasion, and Mr. John Thomas gave a harp solo with much effect.

THE members of the Trinity Choral Union gave an invitation Concert on Tuesday evening the 2nd ult., in the practice-room, Upper North Street, Poplar. Mr. T. Coburn, its founder, conducted, and Miss Anderson and Mr. Poole, organist of St. Luke's, Millwall, presided at the piano. The programme consisted of a new Cantata by G. Wells, with glees, part-songs, solos, &c., the whole of which were performed very creditably by the members, unassisted by professional aid, reflecting great credit on the Conductor and the executants.

IT is with much regret that we record the serious illness of Herr Joseph Lidel, the well-known and much-respected violoncellist, and also that his sufferings are deepened by the urgent need of pecuniary assistance. As it is announced that subscriptions will be received by the music publishers, named in the advertisement on p. 256, we sincerely hope that, after an arduous career of upwards of half a century in his adopted country, he will not be suffered to end his days in poverty.

ON the 10th ult. the Downs Musical Society gave an excellent performance of Haydn's "Creation" at the Downs Chapel, Hackney. The choir (which is evidently making good progress under its Conductor, Mr. Wallis) rendered the choruses with much effect. The soprano solos were taken by Madame West, and the tenor and bass by Messrs. Stedman and Wadmore respectively, their exertions being thoroughly appreciated by the audience. Mr. Henry Parker, as usual, was a most efficient accompanist.

WE much regret to announce the death, on the 25th of March, of Mr. C. J. Bond, of Brighton. The deceased was a pupil of Attwood, and a chorister of St. Paul's Cathedral, and from 1829 had taken a prominent part in musical affairs in Brighton. He was for thirty-six years organist of Trinity Church, and for seven years of St. Patrick's. Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was first performed at Brighton, under Mr. Bond's direction, in 1850.

DURING Lent, Special Services have taken place at St. Peter's Church, Windmill Street, on Sunday evenings, at which music has been a prominent feature. The choir has been assisted by Mrs. Loveday, Miss A. Fripp, Mdlle. Rudersdorff, Mr. Mansfield, and Mr. H. G. Froome, all of whom produced a good effect in various solos suited to the season. The organ accompaniments have been played throughout by the Organist, Mr. A. Dorey.

MADAME ST. GERMAINE gave a Soirée Musicale on Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., at her residence, Holland Place, Kensington, when a programme was provided which exhibited to much advantage the proficiency of her pupils, both in solo and part-music. Sir Julius Benedict accompanied two of the songs on the pianoforte; and the concert, which was fully and fashionably attended, was in every respect highly successful.

MESSRS. PUTTICK AND SIMPSON announce that they will sell by auction, on the 15th inst., the whole of the unpublished manuscripts of Rossini, numbering 154 works. Each purchaser, it is stated, will be entitled to register the copyright in his own name, and each piece is signed by the composer. So interesting a sale will no doubt attract a large number, not only of music-publishers, but of amateur collectors.

AT All Saints', Gordon Square, the Psalms are being chanted, at the 7 o'clock Sunday evening services, to Crowdy's Cadences, otherwise known as "Free Chant." In this form of recitation the musical phrase consists of two notes to each half verse of words, and by its use (so it is claimed) the choir and congregation can divide the words automatically, without any pointing marks beyond the Prayer-Book colons.

WE understand that Dr. Armes's Oratorio "Hezekiah" is to be included in the prospectus of the forthcoming Worcester Musical Festival. The work was written for and performed at the series of concerts given by Mr. William Rea, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in aid of the Infirmary, last December; and since then the composer has added two new Choruses.

ON the 24th ult. the marriage of Florence Marian, only daughter of Mr. Henry C. Lunn, with F. Dyson, eldest son of the late James Lacy, Esq., of Salisbury, was solemnised at St. George's, Bloomsbury, the officiating minister being the Rev. Charles Lacy, uncle of the bridegroom. Mr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ.

THE performance of Rossini's "Mosé in Egitto," by the Sacred Harmonic Society on the 24th inst., promises to be an event of much interest in this season's series of concerts. In order to ensure the most satisfactory rendering of the work, we understand that special rehearsals have been given, under the direction of Sir Michael Costa.

A NEW and suitable concert organ is now being built for St. James's Great Hall by Bryceson Brothers and Ellis. The present case-work is to be extended and completed. The original decorations specially designed long ago by the late Mr. Owen Jones will be carried out forthwith, and before the new instrument can be erected.

WE learn that an amateur in Yorkshire has become the fortunate possessor of the famous Ruggerius violoncello, which has been so many years the property, and favourite solo instrument, of the prince of violoncellists, Signor Piatti.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN has been graciously pleased to accept a copy of the new loyal national chorus written by the Rev. R. Potter, M.A., Rector of Corley, composed by Dr. Monk, York Minster.

REVIEWS.

L'Allegro, Il Pensieroso, ed Il Moderato. Oratorische Composition von Georg Friedrich Händel, mit ausgeführtem. Accompagnement bearbeitet von Robert Franz. Partitur.

[Leipzig, Leuckart.]

Those who speak of England as a Handel-loving country are not far wrong. We do love Handel in a measure denied to any other composer. Yet it is astonishing, considering the number of the master's great works, how few of them are known. Even from his Oratorios a large group might be taken as almost entirely new to the English public. Can we say that "Esther" is aught but strange, notwithstanding an occasional performance? or "Deborah"? or "Athaliah"? or "Semele"? or "Joseph"? or "Hercules"? or "Alexander Balus"? Why is this? An answer to the question would necessarily include a variety of considerations, with only one among which we are now concerned, and that one refers to the need generally admitted of adapting Handel's thin score to the modern orchestra. We entirely waive the argument whether or not any circumstances can justify interference with the work of a dead master. Those who maintain the negative have heavy odds against them, and it has come now to be regarded as a matter of course that Handel's instrumentation should be brought up level with the times. We have known this done in several cases recently. When "Jephtha" was revived by Mr. Barnby, additional accompaniments were written for it by Mr. Sullivan; and when "Esther" and "Susanna" were produced at the Alexandra Palace by Mr. Weist Hill, a similar task was entrusted to Mr. Halberstadt. But it is not every concert-giver who can afford to pay a competent musician to do such delicate work, nor can a competent musician be easily found to undertake it. This, we doubt not, is one of the reasons why so many of Handel's Oratorios, Cantatas, &c., are neglected. It is supposed that they would have no chance without modern orchestral effects, and where provision has not been made for those effects the works are permitted to remain unknown. Herein, we sincerely believe, lies an explanation of the scant regard bestowed upon the grand composition now under no ice. "L'Allegro ed Il Pensieroso," though wanting the interest of a story, if not of an "argument," is undoubtedly one of Handel's finest inspirations, and shows, perhaps, more conclusively than any other, the scope of his genius as a master of expression. It passes through the whole gamut of human feeling, and sketches with a master hand the characteristics of every emotion. For mirth it gives us "Haste thee, nymph;" for light-heartedness, "Come, and trip it as you go;" for pensiveness, "Join with thee calm peace and quiet;" for religious feeling, "There let the pealing organ blow;" and so on till example crowds upon example in embarrassing number. We find it hard to believe that such a work is rejected per se, and we earnestly wish to make the fact conspicuous, that as far as the want of additional accompaniments presents an obstacle to revival, the obstacle exists no longer. Nor, indeed, has it existed for seven years. It was in September, 1871, that Robert Franz completed the task of adapting the accompaniments of "L'Allegro ed Il Pensieroso" to a modern orchestra. Not everything done in Germany, however, becomes quickly known in England, and, to the best of our belief, Franz's version of the work has never had a hearing this side of the North Sea. Surely to call attention to the fact will be enough.

We need not take much pains to vindicate Franz's position as a writer of additional accompaniments. He has done much in that way, and so rarely made a mistake, that it is easy to believe him specially gifted for the work. Special gifts, or, at any rate, common qualities developed in a special degree, are necessary to it. High technical skill is of course demanded, but, in addition, there must be a perfect acquaintance and sympathy with the method of the original composer, and a complete subordination of self. The temptation is to do what the restorer thinks best, rather than what a study of the original shows the composer would have done had he possessed modern resources. And this is a temptation particularly hard to resist. Many have yielded to it, as the frequenters of Exeter Hall well know. Even Mozart is amongst their number; the offence in his case, however, being condoned by the result of genius. On the other hand Robert Franz is a model of good judgment in union with self-restraint. His accompaniments, in small details as in general character, reflect the style and method of the original work to an extent that makes us marvel. Looking, for example, upon the score before us, it is hard to disabuse the mind of a notion that the whole work is by the same hand. And yet Franz does not hesitate frequently to add matter of his own, as when he takes the opening unison phrase and builds upon it an independent theme. In almost every case, however, the welding of old and new is so neatly done, and the new so closely resembles the old, that even a cultured stranger might accept the result, apart of course from the instruments employed, as pure Handel. Than this we know no higher success in the premises. But Franz is to be further commended for the moderation with which he has used the resources at his command. It sometimes happens that writers of additional accompaniments fall into the error of supposing that because certain instruments are in modern orchestras they must necessarily be employed. The result is often incongruous colour, and almost always the overloading of the original matter. Herr Franz makes no such mistake. In the work before us the fullest orchestra is made up thus: two trumpets, two horns, drums, two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, and strings. From first to last the trombones have not a note, and even the trumpets are sparingly employed apart from the instances in which Handel introduced them himself. To put the matter briefly and with emphasis, we cannot imagine a result more in consonance with the character of the original. While preserving to Handel his individuality, even in details, Franz has contrived to modernise his orchestra, and now there only remains to reap the benefit. Will not some one or other of our societies or artistic concert-givers take up "L'Allegro" as we here have it, and show the public how great a masterpiece they have hitherto been content to know only by detached fragments?

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.

Speech in Song, being the Singer's Pronouncing Primer of the principal European languages, &c. By Alexander J. Ellis, B.A., F.R.S., F.S.A., &c. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

This is a most formidable liber primarius. Talk of "greats" or "smalls," or Indian Civil Service examinations, they are nothing to what it is evident the musical student of the new generation may have to undergo. He will perhaps be expected to critically compare the Greek texts of the ancient harmonicians, and to be able to improve the Latin of Meibomius. He must be a fair mathematician, a consummate linguist, an acoustician, and tolerably well versed in the kindred physical sciences. When he has mastered his pianoforte as well as these acquirements, and has skimmed through harmony, counterpoint, canon, fugue, form, orchestration, and the history and literature of music, he will take Mr. Ellis's "primmer"—as the author tells us to call it—and learn "glossic." On this last account we congratulate all musicians who were born some years ago; for they are not likely to take to glossic now. Not that glossic or Mr. Ellis's book are unimportant—far from that. The new Primer is not only important, but of great interest. It is, however, immensely more difficult than the author thinks. He may add that it is we who are immensely more stupid than we think. That is possible—indeed, he has convinced us of it; for we leave it to any average intelligence to rise, as they say in reviews, from the perusal of this work, and confess if it does not feel itself considerably "shut up." We understand all about the "flatus" flai·tus, the "physems" fei·semz, the "arytenoids" ar'·itee·noidz, and can even get over "cartilaginous" kaa·rtilaj·inous, but "toe" toa bothers us. So do other e finals when represented in glossic by u. Toe and so, written toa and soa, seem to indicate a species of what Mr. Ellis would call a "recoil," which in other respects is an interesting and important feature in his theory and analysis of pronunciation. Neither do we quite appreciate his distinction between "thin" and "then," the latter word being written "dhen." The distinction in the sound is plain enough, but the slightest indication of the letter D implies that the tongue touches the palate; whereas in the word "thin" the tongue touches the teeth, and in "then" it touches only the gums in the lower cavity of the mouth. The assistance of the palate produces a different effect to our th in "then." Of course, it is easy to criticise according to individual appreciation the details of a system which must have cost Mr. Ellis a lifetime of thought and labour, the general results of which are gratefully recognised by the philologists of the day; but his invention, like all others, will have to go through the sieve. Whatever re-arrangement may be made in the phonetic characters, the general theory of "Speech in Song," from the mechanical production of sounds through the vocal organs to their classification as tested by the most recent scientific theories of resonance, should be eagerly studied by young singers of intelligence. The labours of Mr. Ellis in that department are so well known they require no recommendation on our part. We would rather advert to one or two little points for consideration. On behalf both of the singer and of euphonious English, we cannot too highly approve Mr. Ellis's condemnation of the custom, so common in our best writers, of using a instead of an before certain words commencing with the aspirate. The right rule was given years ago by one of our best grammarians, Dr. Crombie. When the accent is on the first or third syllable the aspirate is used—as "a history," "a histrionic;" and not when on the second—as "an harmonic," "an historical," &c. When we come in "Speech in Song" to the other modern languages, Mr. Ellis tells us that in Spanish there is no aspirate. He means, of course, that the aitch is not sounded in that language. The ordinary cockney pronunciation of "the Alhambra" is more correct than that of the exquisite who wishes to separate himself from the vulgar by overdoing his aitches. The h in Alhambra only broadens the sound of the word, giving it a slight tinge of its Moorish origin. On the other hand, there is no language which contains a stronger aspirate than the Spanish in the j, and in a less degree in the g. We do not wish to air a little special knowledge, but Mr. Ellis will thank us for telling him that were singers or his readers to pronounce "Virginio" as he gives it (page 135), veer-khee'neeo, it would be truly terrifying to the Spanish scholar. The pronunciation is veer-heeneeo with a very strong "physem" indeed. The least touch of the k would represent the commonest vice of Englishmen in attempting to speak Spanish. As a compensation for so slight an error in his Spanish, Mr. Ellis suggests to us not to think we are speaking fine German in saying "Ger-te" for Gœthe, one of a thousand useful and excellent hints the reader will find in the rather stiff pages of this "Music Primer." There is too much of it, and it wants system as to the immediate object in view. At times it descends to pedagogism in telling us how to pronounce "registration;" which might induce Messrs. Novello and Co. to print their Primers on stout calico to provide against the depredations of tiny fingers. At other times it attacks questions or enters into details only interesting to the educated philologist. But any one, if even indisposed to pursue the study of glossic, and therefore unable to thoroughly comprehend Mr. Ellis's book, can at all events derive from a chapter or two here and there, and an occasional reference to the index and dictionary, certain novel and interesting notions in regard to the phenomena of speech that we can promise him have not hitherto been dreamt of in the philosophy of most of our readers. We do not think that Herr Henschel would sing "nicht" neekyht, nor are we satisfied that the notation of inchoant diphthongs, and other equally difficult matters, is anything like settled. But in racing over "Speech in Song," as we have done, without an attempt at diving into its profundities, we knew beforehand we could have no higher authority on the subject than Mr. Ellis, and are satisfied it only wants some previous knowledge, as well as a little effort and leisure, on the part of the reader, to invest this Primer with a practical importance superior to that of any in the series in which it appears.

Songs of Israel. Being Psalms, Hymns, and Chants, with Hebrew words, as used in the Synagogue service, and an English paraphrase. Composed and arranged for four voices, with an accompaniment for pianoforte or organ. By A. Saqui, Choirmaster of the Old Hebrew Congregation, Liverpool. [Boosey, Patey and Co.]

Mr. Saqui tells us, in explanation of his motive for issuing this collection of music used in the Synagogue service, that on assuming the direction of the choir of Liverpool Old Hebrew Congregation, he found that most of the pieces published for Hebrew worship were by Continental composers, and written for females to sing the soprano parts. As females, however, do not take part in the choral service of orthodox choral congregations, he was compelled either to transpose them, or to compose new melodies, a selection from which is contained in this volume. If his work had been intended only for the use of the synagogue, of course there could have been no reason why the Hebrew words should not have been retained; but, in anticipation of the music being acceptable to other than Hebrew congregations, an English translation—or, rather, paraphrase—has been fitted to the melodies, with much care and judgment. Whether the editor's desire may be fulfilled we cannot say; but certainly there is much devotional simplicity in several of the numbers, all of which are admirably in sympathy with the text. The harmonies are usually somewhat bald, and the accompaniment has rarely an independent part; yet many of the pieces—especially the Hymn, "Praise ye the living God," the Psalm, "Lift the sound of high acclaim," and the Hymn, "When death comes near,"—we can imagine might produce a fine effect when sung by a well-trained choir.

Hark! 'tis Music. Part-song.
Come away to the woods. Part-song.
Sweet hour of rest. Part-song.
Written and composed by Gabriel Davis.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

These part-songs are unequal in merit, but all are melodious, carefully voiced, and in sympathy with the words. As Mrs. Davis is her own poet, she cannot complain if her verses do not inspire her with a very high order of music; and if, in her double capacity of author and composer, we affirm that her ambition has not led her to soar beyond her powers, we presume that we award all the praise she could desire. There is very little attempt to do more in the first song on our list than colour the words with a smoothly harmonised theme, the accompaniment being merely a reduction of the voice-parts. "Come away to the woods" has rather more point, the responsive phrases throughout being exceedingly happy. "Sweet hour of rest," commencing with a symphony, has an independent pianoforte accompaniment, which much heightens the effect. The passages of imitation, however, on the third page, where the basses commence the answer on a bare fourth with the sopranos—alternately perfect and diminished,—we cannot like. This, of course, could be easily altered.

Together. Song. Words by Miss Amelia B. Edwards. Music by Mrs. Mounsey Bartholomew.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A pleasing and well-written semiquaver accompaniment which runs throughout this song gives much life to the simple theme which Mrs. Bartholomew has wedded to the poetry; and both music and words are most attractive. The modulations are natural and always appropriate to the text; one especially where the close in B major (page 2, eighth bar) is followed by a phrase in G major and another in E minor being particularly happy. We are glad to see songs of so artistic a character rapidly multiplying.

The British National March. For the Pianoforte. By George Dolman. [Simpson and Co.]

Mr. Dolman has chosen a somewhat ambitious title for a March which we should imagine must be his first attempt at composition, for, not to dwell upon the harmony of the first two bars of his theme, where the third inversion of a dominant seventh rises to the second inversion of a key-note triad, he has actually written the melody of "God save the Queen" in $\frac{3}{2}$ time and marked it $\frac{6}{4}$, and afterwards forced it into common time, or rather $\frac{2}{4}$, so distorting the natural accents of the words (which are written under the notes) by making the stress fall upon "thee" and "she," that it appears almost like burlesque. We trust that this March will not be accepted in foreign lands as a specimen of "British National" music.

Six Original Pieces. Composed expressly for the Estey Organ. By E. C. Essex. [Hodges and Essex.]

These pieces fulfil their mission and are exceedingly effective on the instrument for which they are composed. They are of a classical form and vein, and as compositions are very fairly manipulated. Their chief attractiveness consists in being of a sound healthy style, and presenting no passages likely to cause the performer much trouble.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Under the title of "Alma l'Incantatrice" (the Enchantress), M. de Flotow's new Opera in four acts was produced for the first time at the Théâtre-Italien in Paris on the 9th ult., with Mdlle. Albani as the heroine, and was extremely well received, although the opinions of critics are divided as to the originality of the music. The new work of the veteran composer of "Martha" is, in fact, a development of two previous treatments by him of the same subject, the first of which was brought out as early as 1843 at the Paris Opéra-Comique as a one-act Melodrama called "L'Esclave de Camoëns," the second being an Opera in three acts entitled "Indra," which was successfully produced ten years later, in 1853, at Vienna. "L'Esclave," "Indra," and "L'Incantatrice," then, are one and the same ideal personification of an Indian girl, whom the author of the libretto, M. Saint-Georges, has brought into contact with the great Portuguese poet, Camoëns, while living in exile at Goa, and whose adventures in company with the poet upon his subsequent return to Lisbon form the chief elements of interest in the drama. The plot is extremely simple, there being but few leading characters involved, viz., besides that "created" by Mdlle. Albani—who, according to the unanimous opinion of the French press, proved a veritable enchantress both vocally and histrionically—those of Camoëns (Nouvelli), an innkeeper, and his wife La Zingarella (Ramini and Madame Sanz), and the King, Don Sebastian of Portugal (M. Verger). Since the above first representation, M. de Flotow's new work has had three repetitions previous to Mdlle. Albani's departure for London, after which it will be laid aside for a short time only to reappear at the Italien in its original French version. At the Opéra-Comique a new Opera in three acts, entitled "Suzanne," is in course of preparation, the scene of which is laid in England, the chief actors being undergraduates at the Cambridge University about the year 1780. The composer is M. Paladilhe. The musical and operatic performances at the resuscitated Théâtre-Lyrique will be inaugurated by M. Samuel David's choral and orchestral work entitled "Triomphe de la paix," a subject which, we trust, will eventually prove appropriate in the present crisis of European politics. At the Grand-Opéra the rehearsals of M. Gounod's Exhibition Opera, "Polyeucte," continue with great activity under the superintendence of the composer. Mdlle. Mauri, the young dancer from the Scala at Milan, is to make her début in the great scene in the fourth act, the "Fête de Jupiter."

A somewhat curious question is being raised before the Paris Civil Tribunal respecting M. Gounod's Opera, "Cinq-Mars." It appears that before setting to music MM. Gallet and Poirson's libretto, the composer had for some years been in the possession of another text-book, bearing the same title, from the pen of MM. Planard and Saint-Georges, which, however, not being quite to his liking, he had ultimately laid aside. The heirs of the joint authors of the abandoned libretto now consider that some compensation is due to them either directly by the payment of a sum of money, or indirectly by way of granting them a share in the rights of collaboration, upon the work represented at the Opéra-Comique. Hence another of the many lawsuits in which it has been M. Gounod's misfortune to become involved.

A complete edition of the Memoirs of Hector Berlioz has just been published by Calmann-Levy in Paris, comprising the composer's autobiography, his travels in Italy, Germany, Russia, and England, as well as a number of critical and polemical notes and essays. M. Grenier, the author of an excellent translation of Forkel's Life of J. S. Bach, has issued a French version of Herr Ehlert's "Letters on Music."

Madame Norman-Néruda, the eminent violinist, has been the recipient of a series of ovations at the Concerts Populaires. M. Louis Coenen, the excellent Dutch pianist, has created much enthusiasm at a concert recently given by that artist in the French capital.

During the performances of Italian Opera at the Kroll'sche Theater at Berlin a young débutante, Mdlle. Saurel, has attracted the attention of connoisseurs on account of her exceptional vocal and dramatic powers. The operatic undertaking in question is, however, likely to be brought to an abrupt termination in consequence of the sudden disappearance of the impresario, Signor Trevisan.

Herr Wagner's "Nibelungen-Tetralogy" is gradually being placed upon the répertoire of the leading operatic stages of Germany. The first performance at Munich of "Siegfried" was to have taken place on the 22nd ult., with Herr Vogl as the representative of the hero. At Leipzig alternate performances of "Rheingold" and "Walküre" were to commence on the 28th ult. Hamburg and Schwerin have already produced parts of the Tetralogy, while the directors of the Cologne Stadt-Theater have obtained the permission of the poet-composer for the performance, at no distant date, of the entire work.

"Luther in Worms" is the title of a new oratorio by L. Meinardus, which was recently performed for the first time at Elberfeld, and which is said to be a work of great power and originality.

It is announced in German journals that Herr Julius Stockhausen, the eminent baritone, and for some years leader of the Stern'sche Gesangverein of Berlin, has accepted a professorship at the newly-founded Hoch'sche Conservatorium at Frankfort, of which Herr Joachim Raff is the director. Madame Schumann is likewise said to have accepted the post of Professor of the higher Pianoforte Classes at the same establishment. If these reports be true, the young institution bids fair to be soon raised into a position of high importance in Germany.

At the Viennese Conservatorium Madame Artôt-Padilla is likely to replace Madame Marchesi in the vocal section of the Imperial establishment.

Madame Pauline Lucca will, it is rumoured, shortly reappear at the Imperial Opera at Vienna as Donna Anna in "Don Giovanni," with Signora Trebelli in the character of Zerlina, and M. Faure in that of the Don.

A life-size portrait of Franz Liszt, "the benefactor of the institution," was recently unveiled with great solemnity at the Academy of Music at Pesth.

A catalogue of the valuable collection of books, music, &c., of the late Julius Rietz, has just been published at Dresden. It contains some 3,000 numbers, of which 1,020 appertain to practical music. The collection is to be put up to auction.

Mozart's grave, at the St. Mark Cemetery at Vienna, has lately been desecrated by some ruffians, who greatly disfigured the granite base of the splendid monument erected over the immortal master's remains, taking away with them the beautifully executed medallions inserted into the pedestal, among them one bearing the composer's profile. The perpetrators of this act of vandalism have not yet been discovered.

A bronze statue of Beethoven, cast at the Tourbain foundry at Vienna, is on its way to Paris to form part of the Viennese section at the International Exhibition.

A French troupe of operatic artists is just now performing with great success at the Opera House at Lisbon.

Beethoven enthusiasts may envy, in a sense, the amateurs of the town of Milan, where, thanks to the efforts of a resident professor, Herr Roeder, the immortal "Ninth Symphony" has just been heard for the first time.

According to the Musikalisches Wochenblatt, the Italian Opera at Moscow is not likely to open its doors next season, having closed this year with a deficit of some 100,000 roubles. It will probably be replaced by a national institution.

French journals announce the death of Eugène Gautier, a musician of merit, the composer of several operas, and for some time the musical critic of the Journal Officiel. The non-success of his latest operatic work, "La clef d'or," which was brought out at the Théâtre-Lyrique last year, is said to have greatly affected his health. He died on the 1st ult.

Hermann Küster, for many years Musikdirector at Berlin, and composer of several Oratorios, died on March 17, at Herford, in Westphalia.

The death is announced also of Madame Johann Strauss, the wife of the famous composer of dance music. She was once a favourite member of the Viennese Opera, under her maiden name of Jetty Treffz, and had acquired great popularity also in this country some quarter of a century ago.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Paris.—Concert du Conservatoire (March 31): Symphony in D (Beethoven); Fragments from "Stabat Mater" (Salvayre); Adagio from Septett (Beethoven); Overture "Carnaval romain" (Berlioz). Concert Populaire (March 31): "La damnation de Faust" (Berlioz). Concert du Châtelet (April 7): "La damnation de Faust" (Berlioz). Concerts during Passion-week.—Conservatoire: "Eve," Oratorio (Massenet). Populaires: "Le Déluge" (Saint-Saëns); Choral Fantasia (Beethoven); "Stabat Mater" (Rossini). Châtelet: Pastoral Symphony (Beethoven); Requiem (Berlioz).

Leipzig.—Conservatorium Concert (March 22): Quintett, G minor (Mozart); "Hommage à Handel" (Moscheles); Violin Sonata in A (Beethoven); Concerto, E minor (Chopin). Last Gewandhaus Concert (March 28): Symphony, D major (C. P. E. Bach); Symphony, G major (Haydn); Symphony, C minor (Beethoven). Last "Euterpe" Concert (March 19): Symphonic-poem, "Prometheus" (Liszt); part of Violoncello Concerto (Rubinstein); Scherzetto (Couperin); Tarantelle (Piatti); Symphony, C minor (Beethoven). Conservatorium Concert (March 29): Sonata for violoncello (Mendelssohn); Double Concerto (Spohr); Toccata Fugue (Bach-Tausig), &c. Riedel'sche Verein (April 5): "St. John Passion Music" (Bach). Conservatorium Concert (April 2): Pianoforte Sonata, G major (Beethoven); Fugue for pianoforte (Hünefeld, pupil); Violoncello Sonata (Reinecke); Allegro and Preludes (Chopin); Rhapsodie (Liszt).

Berlin.—Symphonie-Capelle (March 17): "Ossian" Overture (Gade); Symphony, G minor (Mozart); Symphony, C minor (Beethoven); Overture to "Rosamunde" (Schubert); Huldigungs March (Wagner). Bilse Concert (March 20): Ottett (Mendelssohn); Symphony, B flat major (Beethoven); Third Rhapsodie (Liszt); &c. Cäcilien Verein (April 8): "Faust" Music (Schumann). Sing-Akademie (April 12): "St. Matthew Passion Music" (Bach). Symphonie-Capelle (March 31): Overture, "Leonore" (Beethoven); Violin Concerto (Molique); Pastoral Symphony (Beethoven); Overture, "Medea" (Cherubini); Overture "Calif of Bagdad" (Boieldieu). Bilse Concert (April 3): Overture, "Euryanthe" (Weber); Phaëton (Saint-Saëns); Ballet-Music to "Rienzi" (Wagner). Symphonie-Capelle (April 3): "Faust" Overture (Wagner); Violin Concerto (Bruch); Symphony (Schumann); Minuet (Dorn).

CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. BLAKE OF SALISBURY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The second part of Dr. Grove's new "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," just published, has an article on Dr. Blake, the Cathedralist, wherein his Christian name is given as "William," and his death placed at "about 1780." If the writer of this account had taken the trouble to look at the short memoir in my "Psalmody," of which I believe he is not ignorant, he might have avoided these errors and been enabled to give some further information respecting the Doctor.

Since, however, my little attempt to serve the cause of musical biography is ignored in that quarter, perhaps you will kindly allow me to give in your columns the substance of my notes from the books at Oxford and the Chapter records at Salisbury.

The Rev. Edward Blake was born at Salisbury; entered at Baliol College, Oxon.; graduated B.A., Oct. 13, 1733; elected Fellow of Oriel College, 1736; graduated M.A., July 6, 1737; elected Perpetual Curate of St. Thomas's, Salisbury, Nov. 18, 1740; graduated B.D., April 4, 1744; appointed Vicar of St. Mary's, Oxford, 1754; graduated D.D., Nov. 14, 1755; appointed Prebendary of Salisbury and Rector of Tortworth, Gloucestershire, 1757; died June 11, 1765.

In Langdon's "Divine Harmony," 1774, Blake is called "William," but those who relied on that description should have noticed that he is there styled "late," which would have prevented the second error.—I am, sir, faithfully yours,

Henry Parr.

Vicarage, Yoxford, April, 1878.

P.S.—I may notice that in the first part of the "Dictionary" Attwood is stated to have been appointed Organist of St. Paul's in 1795, "on the decease of Jones," which is self-contradictory, as Jones did not die till February, 1796.

Again, Baildon's appointment as Organist of St. Luke's, Old Street, &c., is put at 1768, but I find him described in that office in 1762 and 1763. These slips, likewise, might have been escaped by attention to what your humble servant had to say on the matter.

THE STENOGRAPHONE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In reply to "Young Composer," whose letter appeared in the Musical Times for February, I beg to state the result of inquiries made of Messrs. Debain and Co. at their London house. In their answer to my letter it was stated that accessories of the kind were of little mercantile value, and that the demand for the Stenographone, when perfected many years ago by M. Debain, did not at all justify the usual outlay in establishing new instruments. Consequently the manufacture of similar ones had been thrown aside. Trusting that you will insert this in the next number of your excellent journal,—I am, sir, yours faithfully, Tyro.

"G. A. C." writes to us to correct a slip of the pen in his letter which appeared in our last number. In paragraph two, "Rochdale, Yorkshire," should be "Rochdale, Lancashire."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will greatly oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Anstruther.—The East of Fife Musical Association gave a most successful performance of Handel's Judas Maccabæus on the 18th ult. Among the various Oratorios performed by this enterprising Society none appears to have given greater satisfaction.

Barbados, West Indies.—Mr. T. W. Potter (Organist of St. Leonard's Church, Bridge Town), gave a Farewell Concert on Friday, March 1. The Concert was under the patronage of His Excellency, Governor Strachan, and the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Barbados, and was a complete success. The hall was quite full and the programme gave the greatest satisfaction. The admirably trained Amateur Choral Association, under the bâton of their Conductor, Mr. Potter, gave an excellent rendering of the Choruses, &c. The following items may be especially noticed: The Bridal Chorus from Cowen's Rose Maiden; the Part-songs "Old Daddy Longlegs" (Macirone), and "The Chimes of Oberwesel" (Baumer); Miss Skeete's Song, Schira's "Do not wake me from my dream;" Mr. Potter's Song, "Nancy Lee;" and Mr. H. B. Skeete's Pianoforte Solo, Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor.

Bedford.—A highly successful performance of the Messiah was given at the New Corn Exchange on the 2nd ult., the principal vocalists being Miss Jessie Jones, Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke, Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. Henry Pope, all of whom by their artistic delivery of the well-known solos in this work thoroughly won the good opinion of their hearers. The Choruses—especially "For unto us," the "Hallelujah," and "Worthy is the Lamb"—were most effectively rendered.

Belfast.—Madame Schroeder gave her annual Concert on the 27th of March in the Ulster Minor Hall. The attendance was large; the programme judiciously selected and amply diversified. Both as a vocalist and pianist the bénéficiaire was highly successful, all her songs being re-demanded, and a pianoforte solo, for the left hand only, eliciting the warmest applause. Several artists lent their valuable assistance, and the concert was in every respect thoroughly satisfactory.

Birmingham.—The present series of cheap Oratorio Concerts given by the Philharmonic Union was brought to a close on the 26th of March with a performance of St. Paul. The principal vocalists were Miss Carina Clelland, Mdme. Barnett, Mr. T. M. Hayden (of Salisbury Cathedral), Mr. Hilton, and Mr. Carless. The orchestra was fairly effective, and the work, as a whole, was well performed. The efforts of this society to popularise great works have been very successful, and the general excellence of the chorus reflects the highest credit on the Conductor, Dr. Heap.——Mr. Stockley's Orchestral Concerts have this season been unfortunately limited to two, and the last took place in the Town Hall, March 28. The programme was excellent, comprising Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the Overtures to Mirella, Anacreon, and Semiramide; the Andante from Schubert's unfinished Symphony, and Finale from Haydn's Departure Symphony; two pieces from the ballet music of Rubinstein's Feramors, and an Organ Concerto of Handel's. All were well given. The vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, who created an exceedingly favourable impression, and Signor Fabrini. Mr. Stimpson performed the Organ Concerto. Mr. Stockley conducted with his well-known care and skill.——The last of Messrs. Harrison's Subscription Concerts, on the 8th ult., brought together a large and fashionable audience. The vocalists were Miss Helen Arnim, Mdlle. Friedländer, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, all of whom were highly successful. M. Musin (violin) and M. Ketten (pianoforte) created a similar sensation to that recorded on their previous visit. Mr. Stimpson performed two Organ Solos, and Mr. Thouless gave most efficient aid as Conductor.——On the 11th ult. the members of the recently established musical institution, Mr. Alfred J. Sutton's Choir, gave their first Concert at the Masonic Hall. The programme was somewhat long, but there was nothing in it of poor quality, and it was made specially interesting by the introduction of two pieces never before heard in Birmingham—Gounod's "By Babylon's wave" and Mendelssohn's Motett, "Saw ye not the pallid angel." Besides these important items were Costa's Date Sonitum, Gade's Spring's Message, a selection from Handel's L'Allegro ed Il Pensieroso, and the Solo and Chorus from Spohr's Calvary, "Tho' all thy friends forsake thee." These pieces afforded ample opportunity for the exhibition of the proficiency which the young choir has attained under Mr. Sutton's direction; and in the solo portions of the programme—all taken by members—there was ample evidence of the individual possession of excellent vocal gifts and of careful cultivation. The instrumental pieces were a solo for the violin, Romance by Otto Booth, Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Rondo Brillante in B minor, Ascher's Fantasia on Wallace's Lurline, and Osborne and De Beriot's William Tell Duet. All were well performed, and the violin Romance was re-demanded and repeated. Mr. A. J. Sutton conducted, and the greater part of the accompaniments were capitally played by Mr. George Bond. There was a large attendance.——A performance of Handel's Messiah was given at the Town Hall on the evening of Good Friday. There was a chorus of about 200 voices, with Miss Ellen Lamb, Mrs. Forest Currie, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Tuke as principals; Mr. Stimpson at the organ, and Mr. Charles Ridgway, Conductor. The work was fairly well given, and there was a large attendance.——A series of Promenade Concerts at the Theatre Royal commenced on Saturday evening, the 20th ult.; an orchestra of sixty performers, recruited from Manchester and London, in addition to local sources, being engaged, and vocalists of the first class announced to appear; Madame Rose Hersee and Mr. Vernon Rigby being retained for the first two. Popular programmes, with occasional extracts from high-class works were well executed, under the direction of Mr. D. F. Davis and Mr. Humphries. The enterprise bids fair to be successful.

Blackburn.—On the 11th ult. Mr. T. S. Hayward, Organist of the Parish Church, gave a Concert in the Exchange Hall, which was not, however, so well attended as might have been anticipated. The artists were Miss Matilda Scott (soprano), Herr Bauerkeller (solo violin of Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestra), Mons. Van Biene (violoncello), Mr. T. S. Hayward (solo pianoforte), and Mr. J. D. Bird (accompanist). The programme was well selected, the pianoforte performances of the concert-giver (a worthy pupil of the late Sir W. Sterndale Bennett), M. Van Biene, and Herr Bauerkeller eliciting warm and well-deserved applause.

Bolton.—A Public Soirée was held in the Victoria Wesleyan School, on Saturday, the 6th ult., under the presidency of the Rev. C. F. Nitingale. A selection of vocal and instrumental music was performed, interspersed with readings and recitations. Miss Mitchell presided at the piano, and with Messrs. Parkinson and Bolton gave an effective rendering of Haydn's No. 4 and 6 Symphonies. Songs were contributed by Messrs. W. Longworth, Lee, Ramsden, and Harker, and some Choruses were sung by a choir of about thirty voices.

Cork.—The last Concert of the Orchestral Union for the present season took place on the 28th of March at the Assembly Rooms. The band, which was augmented for this occasion to nearly sixty performers, performed the Overture to Alfonso und Estrella (Schubert), "Hungarian Suite" (Hoffmann), "Marche romaine" (Gounod), and the "Trauermarsch" from Wagner's Götterdämmerung. Hummel's Septett in D minor for pianoforte (Mr. A. Hill), flute (Mr. Galgey), oboe (Mr. Frankham), horn (Mr. McClelland), viola (Mr. Pickering), violoncello (Mr. Harrington), and contrabasso (Mr. Howcroft), was also included in the scheme. Mr. Arthur Hill played Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Capriccio in B minor; and the vocalists were Mrs. Craig, Miss Truscott, Mr. Harvey, and Mr. O'Leary. Mr. W. Ringrose Atkins conducted.

Crewe.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their first performance of Handel's Serenata, Acis and Galatea (followed by a Miscellaneous Selection), in the Town Hall, on the 26th of March, under the leadership of Mr. F. James. The principal vocalists were Miss Pauline Topliffe (Manchester), Mr. G Howard Welch, R.A.M., (Durham), and Mr. J. Warham (Netherton). The band was under the leadership of Mr. S. Benn, of Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestra. Mr. G. Young presided in an efficient manner at the harmonium and pianoforte. The concert was a decided success, both musically and financially; and for the admirable way in which the choral portions of the work were rendered great credit is due to the Conductor, Mr. F. James.

Derby.—At the Concert of the Choral Union, on the 9th ult., Haydn's Coronation Mass and Mendelssohn's music to Athalie, were excellently rendered. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Jones, Miss D'Alton, Mr. C. H. Coulson, and Mr. R. J. Smith. The narrator in Athalie was Mr. Charles Fry, whose intelligence and elocutionary power were much admired. The Choruses as well as the Solos in both works were thoroughly satisfactory. Mr. Cox presided with much ability at the organ.

Edinburgh.—The Nicolson Street Church Musical Association gave a performance of Handel's Athaliah, in the Literary Institute Hall, on the 16th ult., before a large audience. The Choruses were sung with much accuracy and precision, and gave evidence of careful rehearsal. The solo parts were sustained by members of the Society, and several of the Airs and Duets were received with warm marks of approval. The Misses Kennedy and Messrs. Tendall and Anderson were efficient accompanists, and Mr. James B. Shaw conducted with care and ability.

Glasgow.—On Saturday evening, March 30, the members of the Glasgow Abstainers' Union gave for the first time a Concert in the New Public Halls, when Macfarren's Cantata, the Lady of the Lake, was performed. The choral parts were well sung by the members of the Paisley Tonic Sol-fa Institute, conducted by Mr. John A. Brown, the Four-part Song "Not faster yonder rowers' might," sung by the female chorus, "Hail to the chief," and "He is gone on the mountain," being especially well rendered. Miss José Sherrington, Miss Helen D'Alton, Mr. Hollins, Mr. Beale, and Mr. Thornton Wood were the soloists. Mr. Frederic Archer, of the Alexandra Palace, London, accompanied on the organ, and the harp obbligatos were efficiently played by Mr. Coleby. The Concert was most attractive.

Gloucester.—The Choral Society gave its last Concert for the season in the Shire Hall, on the 9th ult., when Jephtha was performed. Of the soloists Miss E. Tayler, R.A.M., in place of Miss Hilda Wilson (who was indisposed), and Miss Stockwell were the most successful. The choruses went with remarkable precision considering that the Oratorio was unfamiliar, and that but short time was available for practice. A small band, led by Mr. E. G. Woodward, and assisted by Mr. J. A. Matthews (harmonium) and Mr. Hayward (pianoforte) played the accompaniments. Mr. C. H. Lloyd conducted. The works given by the Society this season have been Bach's Christmas Oratorio, Barnett's Ancient Mariner, and Handel's Jephtha.——A series of Special Services have been held in the Cathedral on Thursday evenings during Lent, when the choir was augmented by a number of volunteers from the Choral Society. A portion of Haydn's Passion Music was given each evening.——A Concert by the Gloucester Orchestral Association took place on the 23rd ult., at the Corn Exchange. The band numbered fifty performers, and was conducted by Mr. E. G. Woodward. The Overtures to Rosamunde, William Tell, and Masaniello were given with much finish; Boccherini's Minuet for Muted Strings was played with great delicacy, and Schubert's beautiful Ballet Music from Rosamunde showed the band at its best. Mr. C. H. Lloyd (who had a very hearty reception) played the pianoforte part in Beethoven's Concerto in E flat, Op. 73; and Mr. Waite was successful in a Violoncello Solo. Miss Bertha Griffiths was the vocalist. The room was crowded.

Harrow.—On the 27th March, in the Speech Room at Harrow School, the first performance of Mr. John Farmer's quasi-Oratorio, Christ and His Soldiers, was given. The libretto of this work is made up of well-known hymns, woven together in such order as to complete the argument and connect the story of the various phases of Christian warfare, so that the whole is intelligible to the youngest child. Some of the choruses may almost be called dramatic; all indeed are exceedingly fresh and attractive. There was a highly efficient choir of about sixty voices, and an orchestra numbering about forty performers. The soloists were Miss Fonblanque, Miss Annie Butterworth, and Mr. Pyatt; Mr. Hooper (tenor) assisting in the quartetts. Mr. Humphrey Stark, Mus. Bac., Oxon, presided at the organ, and Mr. Farmer conducted. The performance was in every respect thoroughly successful.

Lee.—Under the Conductorship of Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., Oxon., the Lewisham Choral Society gave its closing Concert for the season on March 30, at the Public Hall. Miss Agnes Ross, Mr. Barton McGuckin, and Mr. W. Webster, jun., were the principal vocalists. M. Léon Cats (solo violinist to the King of the Netherlands) played Wieniawski's Polonaise in A, took the solo part in Gounod's Meditation on Bach's Prelude, and performed in Beethoven's Sonata in D for Pianoforte and Violin, each piece being deservedly applauded. Mrs. Harry Brett ably accompanied M. Cats in the Polonaise and played in the Beethoven Sonata. Miss Victor Bath assisted at the pianoforte in the Meditation and played one of Mendelssohn's Concertos. The orchestral music, which consisted of the instrumental portion of Mendelssohn's Lobgesang, the Overture to Paradise and the Peri (Bennett), and the Overture to Cherubini's Anacreon, reflected great credit both upon the Conductor and his colleagues.

LEEDS.—The last of the Town Hall Popular Concerts for the season took place on Saturday, the 6th ult., before a large audience. The principal portion of the programme was composed of Glees and Part-songs, which were well rendered by the combined forces of the Leeds Arion and Calverley Glee Societies. Solos were sung by Mr. E. Jackson and Mr. A. Grimshaw, and a pianoforte piece was played by Miss L. Drake. Dr. Spark contributed some excellent organ solos. At the conclusion of the season it is but just to pay a tribute to the general excellence of these concerts. At a merely nominal price the music-lovers of Leeds have had the opportunity of hearing really high-class music carefully selected and well rendered, for, notwithstanding that the concerts were termed "popular," the compositions performed at them have been of such a character as materially to improve the taste and advance the musical education of the hearers. Without at all sacrificing quality, local singers were given an opportunity of coming before the public, and several most promising débuts were made during the season. Let us hope that this most commendable feature will be preserved in the next year's series.——On the 9th ult. Dr. Spark, the Leeds borough organist, gave a lecture in St. George's Schoolroom on "The Minstrelsy of Old England," before a large audience. The lecturer introduced his hearers to the earliest example extant of English music, "The Chanson de Roland," supposed to have been sung by a minstrel at the Battle of Hastings; as well as the oldest part-song known, "Summer is coming," a canon for four voices. The song he played himself on the piano, and the canon was sung by Miss M. A. Holroyd, Miss Emmeline Kennedy, Mr. Ludgate, and Mr. Dodds, who assisted Dr. Spark with musical illustrations. The Rev. B. Mills presided, and at the close of the lecture a hearty vote of thanks was accorded by acclamation to Dr. Spark.——The recent performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion Music at the Parish church was so excellent as to demand more than a passing recognition. All the deeply pathetic short choruses were given with true devotional feeling; and the more elaborate choral pieces, from their broad and massive character, might almost have been written for Yorkshire voices, so exactly suited is this kind of music to the roundness, weight, and volume of tone peculiar to these choralists. All the solo parts, without exception, require to be sung most carefully and skilfully to be at all effective; and this much we may venture to assert, that—in the absence of an orchestra—Mr. R. S. Burton, the able and talented organist; the two accomplished ladies, in such pathetic and touching Arias as "Break and die," "Jesu, Saviour, I am thine," "Have mercy upon me," "See the Saviour's outstretched arm;" and the male principals (honourable mention ought to be specially made of the tenor), as well as the members of the chorus generally, gave as good an interpretation of this enormously difficult music as could possibly be either wished for or reasonably expected. Passus et sepultus est, "He suffered and was buried," is the subject of this truly sublime masterpiece; the church, therefore, with all its holy associations is the proper place to hear it sung; and the Rev. Dr. Gott, in the last of the three most admirable and appropriate addresses which were delivered, was right when he eloquently remarked that the spirit which animated that noble music should stir something beneath the surface of our lives.

LEICESTER.—The members of the new Choral Society performed Mendelssohn's Elijah for the first time at the Temperance Hall, on Tuesday, March 26. The principal vocalists were Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Cummings, Mr. B. McGuckin, and Mr. Santley. The performance was in every respect highly successful and creditable alike to the Society and its able and indefatigable Conductor, Mr. C. Hancock, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of St. Martin's.——The Amateur Vocal Society gave its annual Invitation Concert on Tuesday evening, the 9th ult., to a numerous audience. The works performed were a selection from Mendelssohn's Christus and 95th Psalm, and H. Smart's Bride of Dunkerron. Mr. H. B. Ellis, F.C.O., conducted, and Miss Deacon was the accompanist.——On Sunday evening, the 14th ult., Rossini's Stabat Mater, with orchestral accompaniments, was performed, for the first time in Leicester, at Holy Cross Church, Wellington Street, by the choir, assisted by a number of musical friends. The solos were taken in creditable style by Mrs. Winterburn, Miss Stafford, Messrs. Webster and Kelly, and the Duet by Misses Barratt and Mawby. The excellence of the performance was mainly owing to the numerous careful rehearsals, under the direction of Miss Clowes, the Organist. Mr. Oldershaw was the Conductor.——Bach's Passion Music was performed at St. Martin's Church, on the 16th and 17th ult., by the choir, largely augmented for the occasion by various musical societies. The soloists were Master Lowe (treble) and Master Smith (alto), from St. George's Chapel, Windsor; Messrs. Jackson, Birch, Gamble, Allen, and Martin. The accompaniments were played in masterly style by the Organist, Mr. C. Hancock, Mus. Bac. An appropriate address was delivered by the Rev. Canon Vaughan. The collection towards the new seats for the choir, on the first evening, amounted to £36. The attendance was large. On the second evening there was again a large congregation, and the collection amounted to £44 5s. 4d.

LEWISHAM.—Mendelssohn's Christus was sung at St. Stephen's on the Tuesday evening in Passion Week, with full orchestral accompaniments. The orchestra was composed of members of the Lewisham Orchestral Society, with Mr. Warwick Jordan as Conductor. The tenor solos were admirably rendered by Mr. T. W. Hanson (of St. Paul's Cathedral), and the choruses by a body of seventy voices. Mr. George C. Martin, the Sub-Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, presided at the Organ, and gave an artistic rendering of one of Mendelssohn's Sonatas at the conclusion of the service.

LIVERPOOL.—Miss Dora Schirmacher's Pianoforte Recital, on the 4th ult., was a great success from a musical point of view, but unfortunately there were only enough people present to about half fill the small concert-room. Herr Heimendahl was the violinist, and Mr. F. E. Barnes, late Organist of St. Margaret's Church, Prince's Road, acted as accompanist. Miss Schirmacher's playing was admirable, and her reputation, which is already considerable, will be greatly added to by her performance on this occasion. She was very warmly received, and recalled to the platform in more than one instance.——The members of St. Andrew's Musical Society gave an open Rehearsal at St. Andrew's Hall, Rodney Street, on the 9th ult., when Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, Schubert's Song of Miriam, and Beethoven's Ruins of Athens, were rendered by an effective choir of about fifty voices. There was a crowded audience, and the performance passed off with great success. Mr. Tomasso Radcliffe was the Conductor.

MANCHESTER.—Madame Samson-Dunne gave her Annual Concert on Wednesday, the 10th ult., at the concert-room of the Athenæum. Amongst the artists were Mr. H. Smith (solo violoncellist) who, in conjunction with Madame Dunne at the pianoforte, gave Mendelssohn's Sonata in D, Op. 58, and Dunkler's Caprice on Hungarian Airs; Mons. J. Jacobs (solo trombone to H.M. the King of Holland) who performed with much effect Beethoven's "Adelaide," arranged for trombone, accompanied, and received an encore; Miss Redfern who played two pianoforte Solos, and Master Dunne, whose violin performances included one movement from Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor. A varied and classical programme was relieved by the solo performances of Miss Payne on the zither. The pianoforte Solos of Madame Dunne were well received, especially Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata." Miss Louisa Bowmont was the vocalist of the evening. ——The last Concert of the season in connection with the Manchester Gentleman's Glee Club was of more than ordinary interest, for it witnessed the first performance in public of the glees to which have been awarded prizes by the Club in the recent competition, besides some of those which were submitted to the judges, but were not fortunate enough to secure an award. In July of last year the Club advertised in the Manchester and some of the London newspapers an offer of two prizes of £20 each for the best serious and cheerful glees. This advertisement was responded to by 114 compositions, comprising sixty cheerful and fifty-four serious glees, and representing eighty composers, being sent in. After a careful examination, "Hence, loathed Melancholy" was selected as the best cheerful glee. The composer is Mr. Henry Lahee, of London. "Hush'd in Death" was selected as the best serious glee. This is the composition of Dr. Henry Hiles. One circumstance connected with the final decision is worthy of mention. Before deciding on the prize-winner of the best cheerful glee, the judges gave their award to another glee called "Humpty Dumpty" as the best musical composition, but left it to the committee to decide whether they could accept it as a glee. The committee decided that "Humpty Dumpty" hardly met their requirements as a glee, but was more of the nature of a musical joke. The decision was communicated to the composer, Mr. Alfred J. Caldicott, of Worcester. At the performance Mr. Caldicott conducted in person, and the glee met with such unanimous approval that (although encores were not permitted) he was compelled to accede to the loud demands for its repetition. Colonel Wilkinson then announced amid the greatest applause that the committee had unanimously decided to give a special prize to Mr. Caldicott.

NEATH, SOUTH WALES.—On Thursday, the 4th ult., a Concert was given at Alderman Davies' Schools by the Neath Harmonic Society. The programme commenced with "Blest are the departed," from Spohr's Oratorio, the Last Judgment, which was sung by the members of the Society in memory of their late conductor, M. Jules Allard. The first and second parts of the concert consisted of Bach's Sacred Cantata, My Spirit was in Heaviness, Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm, As the Hart pants, and Handel's Ode, Alexander's Feast, with orchestral accompaniments; the band and chorus comprising about 100 performers. The Conductor was Mr. I. Ll. Matthews, and Mr. E. G. Woodward led the band. The solos, &c., were most ably rendered by members of the Society, the air "Softly sweet in Lydian measure" (from Alexander's Feast), by Mr. Hopkin Morgan, with violoncello accompaniment by Mr. Louis Waite, being especially effective. There was a most enthusiastic audience, the encores were numerous, and the concert highly successful. It may be stated that this was the first time of Bach's Cantata and Mendelssohn's Psalm above named being performed in South Wales. This Society, which has now been in existence nearly ten years, possesses a good amount of musical ability, and has during the above period performed some of the principal works of the great masters.

NEWBURY.—On the 12th ult. a Soirée took place at the Town Hall, in aid of the Temperance Society of this Town. The principal soloists were Miss Dolton, who was enthusiastically applauded, Miss Harper, Mr. and Mrs. Freeman, Miss Staples, Messrs. Bates and Burrdock. The choir consisted of about forty voices. Mr. W. J. Blacket conducted.——Under the auspices of the Literary and Scientific Institution the first Promenade Concert held in this town was given on the 23rd ult. in the Corn Exchange. The band of the Victoria Rifles, under the management of Mr. Bandmaster Sibold, was engaged for the occasion, and performed a capital selection of dance music to a large and fashionable audience.

NEWPORT, I. W.—The Newport Choral Society, under the presidency of the Revs. Canon Connor and B. L. Green, commenced its career on Thursday the 11th ult. with a fine performance of St. Paul. The band and chorus numbered over 100 and was under the conductorship of Mr. W. R. Yelf; the orchestra being led by Mr. Charles Fletcher. The soloists were Miss Jessie Royd, Mrs. Bradshawe McKay, Mr. A. Kenningham, and Mr. Thurley Beale, and it is needless to say that such an efficient quartett did ample justice to the solos entrusted to them. Especial mention must be made of Mrs. McKay's delivery of "But the Lord is mindful." Mr. Thurley Beale created the greatest enthusiasm amongst a critical audience by his splendid delivery of "Consume them all," "O God have mercy," &c. Miss Jessie Royd was highly successful in "Jerusalem," and "I will sing of Thy great mercies," and Mr. A. Kenningham delivered the tenor music most conscientiously, Stephen's Recitative, "Men, brethren, and fathers," and the other trying recitatives being declaimed with great intelligence and artistic skill. The band played with much precision, and indeed so fine a performance has never yet been heard in Newport, thanks to the thoroughly efficient conductorship of Mr. Yelf.

NORWICH.—The thirteenth Concert of the Norfolk and Norwich Musical Union was given in St. Andrew's Hall, on Thursday evening, March 28. The first part of the programme consisted of Mr. W. H. Cummings's Cantata, the Fairy Ring, the solos in which were sung by Miss Emma Beasley, Miss Orridge, Mr. Minns, and Mr. Smith, all of whom were exceedingly well received. In the miscellaneous pieces which constituted the second portion of the programme, the most noticeable features were Miss Beasley's rendering of Clay's song, "She wandered down the mountain side;" Mr. Arthur Bunnett's brilliant performance of two movements from Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor; Miss Beasley's and Miss Orridge's duet, "Trust her not," and Miss Orridge's "Golden days."

PENMAENMAWR, N.W.—A Sacred Concert was given at the Gladstone Hall, on Thursday the 11th ult., in aid of the Workman's Reading Room, in which several ladies and gentlemen took part. Mr. J. W. Evans was the violinist, and Mr. W. B. Jones, of Bangor Cathedral, the accompanist. Among the pieces which were especially well rendered were "Angels ever bright and fair," by Miss Ridgway, "Be thou faithful unto death (St. Paul), "Virtue, my soul, &c." (Jephtha), by Eos Maelor (encored), and "Whosoever drinketh" (Woman of Samaria, Bennett), by Mr. Davies. The Quartett "Ave Maria" (Gounod), for voice, piano, violin and harmonium, by the Misses Ridgway and Messrs. Evans and Jones, was also greatly appreciated; and the choir gave with good effect "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel," "Hallelujah," &c. The Hall was crowded with a fashionable audience.

ROTHERHAM.—On the 12th ult. an evening Concert was given in the schoolroom of the Congregational church, Doncaster Road, by the Choir of the church, assisted by Mrs. House, of Sheffield, on the occasion of the presentation of a massive silver salver, an illuminated address, and a splendid ivory bâton, silver mounted and exquisitely chased, to the honorary organist, Mr. C. H. Perrot, in recognition of his services for thirteen years as organist and choirmaster. The rendering of the several pieces reflected the highest credit on the executants, and the excellent playing of the band is deserving of recognition. One of the most notable features of the programme was that the majority of its several items were the compositions of Mr. Perrot, principal amongst which was the Processional Hymn, "Onward, Christian soldiers," consisting of chorus, semi-chorus, and chorus (in unison), with piano and flute obbligato, piano, flute, and violoncello; and piano, violins, and flute, and violoncello obbligatos, the rendering of which was so satisfactory that by request it was repeated in the second part. Other original pieces were a Part-song, "Ode to the cuckoo;" a Serenade, "Good night, beloved;" an Anthem, "Hear my prayer;" and a Madrigal "May morning." The concert closed with an Anthem by Dr. W. Spark, "And now Israel," which was conducted by Mr. Perrot, using the bâton presented to him for the first time.

SALISBURY.—The members of the Sarum Choral Society have just presented Mr. Aylward, their Conductor, with a testimonial expressive of their appreciation of his services to the Society. The testimonial consisted of a handsome clock, in black marble and bronze, with side ornaments to match. The base of the timepiece bore the following inscription:—"Wm. P. Aylward, Esq., from the members of the Sarum Choral Society in grateful acknowledgment of his skill, kindliness, and untiring care as their conductor. March 18, 1878."

SELKIRK, N.B.—Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise was given in the Volunteer Hall, on Thursday the 18th ult., by the Selkirk Choral Society. The second part consisted of selections from Bach, Schumann, Wagner, and Liszt. Mr. Nesbitt conducted, Mr. Alfred Heap, organist to the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Home, presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. Anderson, of Edinburgh, at the harmonium.

SHEFFIELD.—At the Albert Hall, Messrs. Peck and Wainwright have continued their twelfth series of Saturday afternoon Concerts, before good audiences, which the excellent character of the performances, chiefly instrumental, richly deserved. Miss Clara Linley and Miss Ferrier in their pianoforte solos and duets, and Mr. Peck as solo violinist, contributed much by their excellent playing to the attractiveness of these entertainments.

SHERBORNE.—The forty-second Concert of the Sherborne School Musical Society took place on the 8th ult., and was in every respect a great success. The selection of Samson for performance by a choir of schoolboys and schoolboy soloists was an ambitious one, but the performance amply justified the ambition. The school orchestra was reinforced by artists from both the Opera Houses, the Philharmonic, and the Crystal Palace, and the result was admirable. The general rendering of the Oratorio was extremely good; Ainslie sang the bass solos with good effect, the delivery of Harapha's recitatives, and the grand air "Honour and arms," being quite worthy of a much more experienced artist. Weekes made a very creditable first appearance, and Bastard was a most efficient alto, his "Weep, Israel, weep" being particularly good. The choruses were quite up to the usual standard—a very high one,—and the entire concert was highly creditable to Mr. Parker, who conducted with much ability.

TAVISTOCK.—An excellent performance, consisting of selections from Handel's Oratorio of Esther, was given in the Town Hall, on Wednesday the 24th ult., for the first time, we believe, in the West of England. The chorus numbered upwards of sixty voices and was conducted by Mr. J. F. Thynne, who for more than thirty years has held the appointment of organist and choirmaster of the parish church, and for whose benefit the performance was given. Mr. Thynne has considerable musical talent, and much experience, and his able training of the choir reflects the greatest credit on his somewhat difficult undertaking. The Rev. T. Gibbons, rector of Petertavy, gave a short lecture in connection with the work. Both solos and choruses were exceedingly well sung, many being redemanded. The hall was quite full, half the seats having been reserved beforehand, and it is hoped that such a successful performance may be repeated.

TRING.—On the 24th ult. the members of the Tring Harmonic Society performed Handel's Messiah, under the conductorship of Mr. Hobson. The soloists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Van Senden, Mr. Redfern Hollins, Signor Brocolini, and Mr. Theodore Drew, Organist of Holy Trinity, Brompton. There was a large and appreciative audience, and the Concert was in every respect a complete success.

WHITTINGTON MOOR.—On Good Friday evening a performance of Handel's Messiah was given in the Assembly Hall in aid of the Congregational Church Building Fund. The solo vocalists were Madame George, Miss Walker, Mr. Thomas Cooper, Mr. Vincent Cooke, and Mr. L. Wilkinson. The whole of the recitatives and airs were admirably rendered, and the choruses were sung with much precision. Mr. J. White presided at the harmonium, and Mr. Walker conducted.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Claude R. Fowles, to All Saints' Church, Babbicombe, Torquay, Devon.—Mr. G. H. Crookes, to the Parish Church, Broughty Ferry, Forfarshire, Scotland.—Mr. T. J. Leaman, to the Parish Church, Warminster, Wilts.—Mr. W. A. W. Howlett, R.A.M., to Christ Church, Cobridge.—Mr. R. Virgoe Miles, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Trinity, Barnet, N.—Miss Margaret F. Fowles, to the Church of SS. Michael and All Angels, Swanmore, Ryde, Isle of Wight.—Mr. Theodore Drew, to Holy Trinity, Parish Church, Brompton.

The following is quoted from an article in the Musical Times of March 1, 1878:—

But a special word must be said in regard to the volume of short "Preludes and Lessons," composed for Queen's College, London, and which is really remarkable among music written for instruction on the pianoforte from its union of beauty and interest in the music with instructive value for forming the style of young players; and perhaps no book of the kind could be named more valuable in this combination of qualities. Each composition is prefaced by a short Prelude containing some special ornament of piano-playing which is to be mastered in it, and the one which follows it affords practice in a more sustained style; each piece again having its own object in regard to teaching some special lesson in execution and expression. Some of them are very short, but in the longer ones the young pupil has the pleasure of finding that, in learning the piece, he (or she) has not only made a step in mechanism and style, but has learned a little piece of music to which the best musician may listen with interest.

MUSIC PRIMERS

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

REV. SIR F. A. GORE OUSELEY, BART., ETC.,

AND

EDWIN GEORGE MONK.

This Work contains nearly 400 Chants, which are appropriated to "Venite exultemus Domino," the Daily and Proper Psalms, &c.; those for each Service occupying a separate page and affording several Series, suitable to each daily portion of the Psalter, from which choice may be made. The Chants have been selected with especial reference to the position of the Reciting-note.

"There is at present a strong and healthy demand for music especially written for the 'king of instruments,' and Mr. Frost has on his part wisely responded to it in the above collection. We have had enough of arrangements and to spare; what we want is music thought out and elaborated with a distinct view to the requirements and nuances of organ-playing. The book before us contains twenty-four pieces of various forms, comprising preludes, postludes, offertoires, fantasias, a march, a sonata, and a fugue. In each of these Mr. Frost shows an intimate acquaintance with the instrument for which he writes, securing breadth and fulness of effect without overcrowding his chords, and having a due regard to the practicable in the left-hand and pedal staves. Mr. Frost's style throughout is thoroughly sound and solid; there are no choppy, quasi-pianoforte accompaniments to be found in the work. We cordially wish the collection the circulation it deserves."—Musical Standard.
